Growing up in Chicago’s Hyde Park neighborhood, Brandon F. Johnson (JD ’12) considered Chicago Mayor Harold Washington and U.S. Representative Adam Clayton Powell Jr. to be his heroes. “These were well-educated public servants who did a lot of good for people. I felt what made Harold Washington, in particular, such a strong leader was his preparedness, including his law degree,” says the 38-year-old Johnson.

Inspired, Johnson decided to go to law school. “I was very drawn to DePaul’s Vincentian commitment to public service that was exhibited in how the law school operated, the perspective of its professors and the long tradition of its graduates going into public service,” he says.

For him, law is a way to give back. “This is a way for me to have the highest impact on the quality of people’s lives, which is the ultimate goal of public service,” he says. He put this philosophy into practice as a project manager for “Reconnecting Neighborhoods” with the Metropolitan Planning Council, a policy analyst in the Illinois General Assembly and, most recently, as director of policy for the Westside Justice Center.

This past summer, he was given an opportunity to broaden his impact. Randall Woodfin, the mayor of Birmingham, Ala., and a former classmate of Johnson’s from their undergraduate days at Morehouse College in Atlanta, tapped him to be the city’s new director of community engagement.

It would mean leaving his hometown and private law practice behind. But the chance to work at the “intersection between public service and public safety” by focusing on crime prevention, enforcement and re-entry was too good to refuse. “All I’m trying to do is make a difference,” says Johnson. “I want to be fair and honest, and do work that brings integrity back to public service.”
