
November 2015

Enforcement of Covenants-Not-To-Compete Against Physicians: Buying the Practice and Employing the Physician-What Rules Apply?

Donald A. Daugherty Jr.

Follow this and additional works at: <https://via.library.depaul.edu/jhcl>

Recommended Citation

Donald A. Daugherty Jr., Enforcement of Covenants-Not-To-Compete Against Physicians: Buying the Practice and Employing the Physician-What Rules Apply?, 1 DePaul J. Health Care L. 93 (1996)
Available at: <https://via.library.depaul.edu/jhcl/vol1/iss1/5>

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the College of Law at Via Sapientiae. It has been accepted for inclusion in DePaul Journal of Health Care Law by an authorized editor of Via Sapientiae. For more information, please contact digitalservices@depaul.edu.

ENFORCEMENT OF COVENANTS-NOT-TO-COMPETE AGAINST PHYSICIANS: BUYING THE PRACTICE AND EMPLOYING THE PHYSICIAN -- WHAT RULES APPLY?

*Donald A. Daugherty, Jr.

INTRODUCTION

One of the more significant legal issues implicated by the rise of integrated health care delivery systems relates to the use of covenants-not-to-compete. Because the value of a medical practice rests largely on the intangible talents of its physicians, noncompete clauses are an essential means of preserving the value of a medical practice as it transfers from seller to buyer. However, since noncompete clauses also have the effect of restraining a person from freely practicing her or her chosen trade, courts generally disfavor covenants-not-to-compete.¹ This is especially true when the covenantor is a physician because of the potential the covenant will interfere with patient relationships.

Nonetheless, most courts recognize and enforce covenants-not-to-compete in the context of the sale of a business (including a medical practice), as well as in employment agreements (including physicians' contracts). For the reasons discussed below, covenants included in contracts for in the sale of a business are enforced more liberally than those applying to an employment situation.

A recent problem regarding covenants, involves their use in a third "hybrid" situation: where a medical practice is sold and the selling physician then becomes an employee of the buyer. Given the disfavor with which courts view covenants-not-to-compete and the divergent treatment of covenants in buy-sale and employment contexts, the question arises as to how a covenant will be treated in the hybrid situation, and whether it will receive the more liberal treatment, in particular, with regard to the length of time that the restriction is in effect.

*Associate, Michael J. Best, Milwaukee, WI. B.A., University of Virginia, 1985; J.D., Northwestern University School of Law, 1985.

¹ Under common law, all contracts in restraint of trade were void as against public policy. Today, the doctrine has been relaxed, and a distinction between general and partial restraints of trade has been recognized by the courts. As discussed in greater detail in this article, while general restraints on trade are still void, contracts which constitute a partial and reasonable restraint are valid where supported by proper consideration. See Tarr v. Stearman, 264 Ill. 110 (1914); Pete v. Kulentis, 257 Ill. App. 213 (1930); Southwest Forest Indus., Inc. v. Sarfstein, 482 F.2d 915 (7th Cir. 1972); Field Surgical Assocs., Ltd. v. Shadab, 59 Ill. App.3d 991 (1978); Field, Lawter Intern, Inc. v. Carroll, 116 Ill. App.3d 717(1983); Cockerill v. Wilson, 51 Ill.3d 179 (1972); Firsch Corp. v. Ezzell, 25 Ill. App.2d 134 (1960); Match Corp. Of America v. Acme Match Corp., 285 S.E.2d 906 (W.Va. 1982).

This article will explore the use of covenants-not-to-compete in the "hybrid" situation, where a medical practice is sold by a physician and the new buyer subsequently employs the seller-physician. Unfortunately, there are relatively few cases that address this situation because, until the recent trend toward consolidation in the health care industry, a physician would usually sell a practice only when he or she intended either to retire, leave the geographic area, or otherwise not be in a position to compete with the buyer. Additionally, in the past the buyers were typically other physicians, as opposed to hospitals and other large health care entities who are now purchasing physician practices. Nonetheless, upon review of both cases involving other professions and businesses, as well as the few that involve physicians, a general rule appears that suggests that in order to receive more liberal treatment, a covenant must be an integral part of the sale transaction and intended primarily to protect the purchase of goodwill by the buyer. A significant factor is the extent of the covenantor's bargaining power vis-a-vis the buyer-employer.

This article will also discuss the treatment by the courts of noncompete covenants, including their restricted use in employment contracts as well as their more liberal enforcement in the sale of a medical practice.

Finally, this article will review the way covenants-not-to-compete have been treated by the courts in a variety of these "hybrid" situations, and will outline considerations and practical guidelines for parties involved in such transactions.

GENERAL LAW REGARDING COVENANTS-NOT-TO-COMPETE

At the heart of all enforceable covenants-not-to-compete is the principle of avoiding unjust enrichment of the covenantor.² In the context of a business sale, courts have reasoned that an individual should not be able to sell his or her business and reap its "going concern" value, then subsequently start a new business to compete against, and thereby jeopardize the value of, the just-sold enterprise.³ In the context of an employment agreement, unless prohibited by state statute, courts allow employers to restrain the activities of ex-employees to avoid any unfair exploitation of trade secrets, customer lists, or other knowledge gained by the covenantor during the course of employment.⁴

² See Reddy v. Community Health Found., 298 S.E.2d 906 (W.Va 1982).

Both in the buy-sell and employment contexts, the general rules governing noncompete clauses are well established.⁵ To enforce a covenant, the threshold requirement is that the covenantor receive some consideration in exchange for agreeing to the restriction.⁶ If this threshold is met, courts will evaluate the reasonableness of a covenant's terms by examining the following factors: (i) the needs of the covenant's beneficiary (i.e., the buyer or employer); (ii) the covenant's duration, territorial extent, purpose and scope; and (iii) the public interest.⁷

Noncompetition covenants arising out of the sale of a business are typically enforced more liberally than those arising out of the employer-employee relationship.⁸ The primary reason for this divergence is that the courts consider an employee to be generally in a weaker bargaining position at the time of contract formation as compared to a party selling his or her business.⁹

³ See generally Id. at 911-914.

⁴ For example, the antitrust statutes of California, Montana and North Dakota expressly prohibit certain contractual restraints upon the practice of a "profession," and have been held to invalidate non-competition clauses in physician employment agreements. Colorado and Massachusetts statutorily prohibit non-competition covenants that restrict physicians from practicing medicine (although monetary damages for harm suffered by the employer as a result of the physician's departure are allowed). Similarly, a Delaware statute declares that covenants-not-to-compete which are ancillary to employment, as well as partnership or corporate agreements which restrict the right of physicians to practice medicine in specific locations for specific periods of time are void, although a covenantor may recover damages for breach.

⁵ Of course, the specifics vary from state to state. For example, some jurisdictions hold that two year restrictions in employment agreements are reasonable, while other states recognize restrictions up to three years.

⁶ See also Basic Computer v. Scott, 791 F. Supp. 1280 (N.D. Ohio 1991); Curtis 1000, Inc. v. Youngblade, 878 F. Supp. 1224 (N.D. Iowa 1995).

⁷ See also Basic Computer v. Scott, 791 F. Supp. 1280 (N.D. Ohio 1991); Curtis 1000, Inc. v. Youngblade, 878 F. Supp. 1224 (N.D. Iowa 1995).

⁸ Alexander & Alexander v. Danahy, 488 N.E.2d 22 (Mass. App. Ct. 1986).

⁹ White v. Fletcher/Mayo/Assocs., Inc., 303 S.E.2d 746, 748 (1983).

A similar rationale has been relied on to justify the more liberal enforcement of noncompetition clauses in partnership agreements, where equal value is exchanged among the contracting parties since each partner not only commits herself or himself to the restrictions, but derives a benefit by exacting the same restrictions from every other partner.¹⁰ For example, while the duration of a restrictive covenant in an employment agreement is generally unenforceable beyond two or three years,¹¹ restriction periods of five or more years in covenants that are ancillary to the sale of a business have been upheld.¹² This is especially significant as applied to the types of transactions discussed here, because the longer the period of restriction and the more secure the value of the acquired practice, the greater is the disincentive for the seller-physician to leave.¹³

Another example of the dissimilar treatment applied to covenants-not-to-compete depending on whether they are included in a contract involving the sale of a business, or an employment agreement, is the rule in certain jurisdictions that does not allow covenants included in employment contracts to be reformed by a court so as to render them enforceable. Reform is, however, permitted for covenants encompassed in a contract for the sale of a business.¹⁴ Other examples of this disparity include Colorado and California statutes that both prohibit the use of noncompete covenants for certain employees except in the sale of business context,¹⁵ and the courts of Louisiana and Alabama which exempt restrictive covenants contained in partnership agreements from statutes prohibiting covenants in connection with employment agreements.¹⁶

One of the most instructive decisions of how the courts treat the issue of non-compete covenants in the employment and sale of business context

¹⁰ Pittman v. Harbin Clinic Prof'l Ass'n, 437 S.E.2d 619 (Ga. Ct. App. 1993).

¹¹ Hammer Holding Group, Inc. v. Elmore, 613 N.E.2d 1190 (Ill. App. 1993).

¹² Id., see, e.g., Sobers v. Shannon Optical Co., 473 A.2d 1035 (Pa. 1984); Betten Co. v. Brauman, 18 Wis. 203, 208 (1935); HBG Corp. v. Houbolt, 367 N.E.2d 414, 432 (N.C. App. Ct. 1977).

¹³ MedX, Inc. of Fla. v. Ranger, 780 F. Supp. 398 (E.D. La 1991); Reddy v. Community Health Found., 298 S.E.2d 906 (W.Va. 1982).

¹⁴ See, e.g., White v. Fletcher/Mayo/Assocs., Inc., 303 S.E.2d 746, 749 (Ga. 1983).

¹⁵ CAL. BUS. AND PROF. CODE § 16600 (1995); 1982 Colo. Sess. Laws, ch. 41 at 232.

¹⁶ LA. REV. STAT. ANN. § 23:921 (West 1995); ALA. CODE § 8-1-1 (1995); See McCray v. Blackburn, 236 So. 2d 859 (La. 1970).

is the non-physician case of *White v. Fletcher/Mayo/Associates, Inc.*¹⁷ In White, the plaintiff was the vice president and a 5 percent shareholder of an advertising agency.¹⁸ When the agency was purchased by a company who then became his employer, White sought a judicial declaration voiding a noncompete covenant he had signed when first employed by the agency.¹⁹ While the purchasing company sought to have the covenant construed as part of the sale of the business (in which transaction the plaintiff had sold his stock), the plaintiff sought to have it construed as part of his employment agreement.²⁰

In analyzing the controversy, the White court stated, “[I]t is problematical whether his profit [on the sale of stock] constituted consideration for his covenant-not-to-compete, or whether the sole consideration flowing to [the plaintiff] in return for the covenant was his continued employment.”²¹ The court went on to hold that:

where a trial judge is asked to determine the enforceability of a noncompetition covenant which the buyer of a business contends was given ancillary to the covenantor's relinquishment of his interest in the business to the buyer, and not given solely in return for the covenantor's continued employment, *the judge must determine the covenantor's status. If it appears that his bargaining capacity was not significantly greater than that of a mere employee, then the covenant should be treated like a covenant ancillary to an employment agreement . . .*²² (emphasis added).

In making this analysis, the White court found that White's bargaining power was no more than that of an ordinary employee and, thus, treated the noncompete clause as ancillary to White's employment contract.²³

¹⁷ White, 303 S.E.2d at 749.

¹⁸ Id. at 746.

¹⁹ Id. at 747.

²⁰ White v. Fletcher/Mayo/Assocs., Inc., 303 S.E.2d 746, 747 (Ga. 1983).

²¹ Id. at 750.

²² Id. at 751.

²³ Id.

COVENANTS-NOT-TO-COMPLETE: EMERGENCE OF A HYBRID IN PHYSICIAN CASES

The rationale articulated in *White v Fletcher/Mayo Associates, Inc.*²⁴ has also been applied by the Georgia courts to cases involving the enforcement of noncompete clauses against physicians, most notably in *Pittman v. Harbin Clinical Profession Ass'n.*²⁵ In Pittman, a group of five neurologists and neurosurgeons sought a judicial declaration to render unenforceable the covenants-not-to-compete in their employment contracts with their former employer, a professional association clinic.²⁶ Two of the plaintiff-physicians had been shareholders in the clinic, while the other three physicians were strictly employees of the clinic and held no ownership interest.²⁷ The shareholder noncompete clauses prohibited the practice of medicine within thirty miles of the clinic for one year after leaving the clinic, but allowed the covenantor to buy out the restriction by paying a specified amount to the clinic.²⁸ The non-shareholder clauses were identical, except that the restricted area encompassed a fifty mile radius from the clinic, and required a lesser sum to buy out the covenant's restrictions.²⁹

After examining the employment covenants, the Pittman court upheld the enforceability of the noncompete clauses against the shareholders; but the court found them unenforceable against the non shareholders.³⁰ The court found the terms of the covenants among the shareholders reasonable. In addition, the court found that although the agreements signed by the shareholders were denominated as "employment contracts," by executing the agreements, the shareholders not only agreed to restrict themselves to the covenants' terms, but obtained promises to do the same from the approximately thirty-five other physician-shareholders who executed identical contracts.³¹ Thus, the court found the bargaining power ²⁴ Id. at 746.

²⁵ Pittman v. Harbin Clinic Prof'l Ass'n, 437 S.E.2d 619 (Ga. Ct. App. 1993).

²⁶ Id.

²⁷ Id. at 621.

²⁸ Id.

²⁹ Id. at 623.

³⁰ Id. at 621-623.

³¹ Pittman v. Harbin Clinical Prof'l Ass'n, 437 S.E.2d 619, 621-623 (Ga. Ct. App. 1993).

of the shareholder-plaintiffs was equal to that of those with whom they contracted, and the agreements were more analogous to medical partnership agreements than traditional employment contracts.³²

With regard to the non shareholder employee physicians, the court examined the covenant's prohibitions, which included forbidding the physicians from practicing within fifty miles of the clinic. The court determined that although the fifty mile radius was not per se unreasonable, because it was included only in the contracts of the non shareholder physicians whose bargaining position was significantly less than that of the clinic, stricter scrutiny of the covenant terms was required.³³

Although the bargaining power factor set forth in Pittman has not yet been expressly adopted or applied to enforcement of physician noncompete clauses in other jurisdictions, several other courts have also considered the treatment of noncompete clauses agreed to by physicians who have then sold practices and become employees of the purchasing entity.³⁴

For example, in Boulder Medical Center v. Moore, the plaintiff physician was part of a partnership which transferred its business to a corporation and then dissolved itself, at which time the purchasing corporation then employed the physician.³⁵ When the plaintiff chose to leave the corporation one year after the transaction, the corporation sought to enforce the covenant included in the physician's original employment contract.³⁶ The Moore court enforced the covenant upon finding that the physician not only owned an interest in the medical practice itself, but in the original partnership that still owned the equipment used in the practice, and in a corporation that owned the land upon which the clinic was located.³⁷ The court also examined the fact that upon the physician's

³² Id. at 621-622.

³³ Id.

³⁴ See, e.g., Isuani, M.D. v. Manske-Sheffield Radiology Group, 798 S.W.2d 346 (Tex. Ct. App. 1990) (discussing the radiology partnership which brought suit seeking to enforce noncompete agreement against one of its partners); Jewett Orthopaedic Clinic, P.A. v. George M. White, M.D., 629 So.2d 922 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1993); Rajiv Chandra, M.D., v. Gopal Dadedia, M.D., 610 So.2d 15 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1992) (discussing a doctor and medical group which brought action seeking, inter alia, preliminary injunction to enforce noncompetition agreements contained in separated employment contracts with physicians).

³⁵ Boulder Medical Ctr. v. Moore, 651 P.2d 464, 465 (Colo. Ct. App. 1982) (predating state statute voiding injunctive relief under noncompete clauses in physician employment agreements).

³⁶ Id.

³⁷ Id.

departure, he was entitled to payment for his interests from all three entities, a circumstance which undermined the physician's assertion that he had not sold his business when he left.³⁸ Therefore, the Moore court held the covenant, which prohibited the physician from practicing medicine in Boulder County for five years after his departure, was enforceable since it fell within the sale of business exception to the state statute voiding certain covenants-not-to-compete.³⁹

Similarly, in Cardiology Assocs. of Southwestern Michigan, P.C. v. Zencka, a group of cardiologists sought to enforce a noncompete covenant against the defendant cardiologist who was a shareholder in the plaintiff-professional corporation. The defendant had signed both an employment contract and a stock redemption agreement that included the covenant. The latter agreement was required under the stock ownership provision of the employment agreement.⁴⁰ Both agreements were executed by the defendant-cardiologist when he became a shareholder in the plaintiff-professional corporation.⁴¹

In Zencka, the court focused on the nature of the signed agreements and concluded that they constituted an employment contract with the sale of stock incident to the employment, rather than a sale of an interest in the cardiology practice with employment incident to the sale.⁴² The Zencka court looked to the first employment contract signed by the defendant, requiring that if the defendant were to continue his employment beyond expiration of the contract, he would have to purchase stock in the corporation.⁴³ The court rejected the plaintiff's contentions, finding that the stock redemption did not effect a complete transfer of the corporation's business, equipment or patient list⁴⁴; and, furthermore, the defendant was

³⁸ Id.

³⁹ Id.

⁴⁰ Cardiology Assocs. of Southwestern Michigan, P.C. v. Zencka, M.D., 400 N.W.2d 606 (Mich. Ct. App. 1985).

⁴¹ Id.

⁴² Id.

⁴³ Echoing Pittman, the court noted additional supporting factors of the employer-employee relationship between the plaintiff and defendant, and the fact that the covenant-not-to-compete did not apply to the two other cardiologists in the group, who were senior to the defendant. Id. at 606-610.

⁴⁴ Id.

merely reselling that which he had initially purchased from the corporation rather than a separate business interest or goodwill.⁴⁵

Finally, in Bosley Medical Group v. Abramson, a hair replacement clinic sued a former physician-employee, claiming he had breached a covenant-not-to-compete in a stock purchase agreement he had entered into with the clinic.⁴⁶ At the outset of his employment, the physician had been given a stock purchase agreement, along with an independent contractor's agreement.⁴⁷ He was advised that he would have to execute both in order to practice with the group.⁴⁸ The stock purchase agreement required that he buy nine shares of the clinic's stock, representing an interest in the corporation of nine percent, at a price of ten thousand dollars.⁴⁹ Seventy-three percent of the corporation's stock was held by a single individual who was the president and director.⁵⁰ The agreement required that the physician sell back the shares if he left the clinic⁵¹ and contained an additional covenant under which the physician agreed not to engage in a similar practice within certain counties for three years after leaving the clinic.⁵² When the physician left two years later and immediately opened his own hair transplant practice nearby, the clinic sought an injunction.⁵³

The Bosley court held that the non-compete covenant was void and agreed with the physician that the stock purchase agreement he was required to sign upon his employment was a sham devised to fit within an exception of California law that prohibits agreements that restrict the practice of a business or profession.⁵⁴ Like the statute in Moore, the California exception permits covenants only when the sale of a shareholder's stock involves a substantial interest in the corporation such ⁴⁵ Id. at 610.

⁴⁶ Bosley Med. Group v. Abramson, 161 Cal. App.3d 284, 287 (2d Dist. 1984).

⁴⁷ Id.

⁴⁸ Id. at 286.

⁴⁹ Id. at 287.

⁵⁰ Id.

⁵¹ Id. at 287.

⁵² Bosley Med. Group v. Abramson, 161 Cal. App.3d 284, 287 (2d Dist. 1984).

⁵³ Id.

⁵⁴ Id. (concluding that "the provision contained in the stock purchase agreement that Defendant will not compete ... is void and unenforceable").

that it constituted a transfer of goodwill.⁵⁵ The Bosley court concluded that the agreement signed by the physician that required his purchase of stock did not qualify under California law because it was not intended to benefit the physician, since the stock represented only a limited interest in the clinic from which he would not produce a reasonable return.⁵⁶

The Bosley court was also convinced of the sham nature of the stock purchase simply because the agreement's stated purpose made little sense. The agreement purported to provide the physician with "additional incentive" to achieve a professional relationship between himself and the clinic.⁵⁷ The court dismissed this as pretextual since the clinic had told the physician that his annual salary would be at least $200,000; and, thus, it was questionable whether a mandatory purchase of $10,000 in stock would create any additional incentive.⁵⁸ Moreover, the "professional relationship" sought by the clinic was already assured by the independent contractor agreement that governed the parties' conduct.⁵⁹

PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS FOR THE PRACTITIONER

In light of the above discussion, parties involved in the formation of integrated delivery systems, physician-hospital organizations and other health care entities that require the purchase of practices and employment of selling physicians, should be cautious in devising covenants-not-to-compete. A critical factor in enforcing covenants in these situations is the bargaining power of the covenantor, as shown in Pittman and the other cases analyzed in this article. An employer will have a more convincing argument that broad restrictions should be enforced against a partner or equity holder in the selling entity, while the argument will be less persuasive with regard to mere employees or associate physicians of the selling practice. Similarly, it may be argued that a shareholder-physician

⁵⁵ Bosley Med. Group, 161 Cal. App. 3d at 287 (quoting CAL. BUS. AND PROF. CODE, § 16601 (West 1995)); Boulder Med. Ctr. v. Moore, 651 P.2d 464 (Colo. Ct. App. 1982) (citing COLO. REV. STAT. § 2 (1973)).

⁵⁶ Bosley Med. Group, 161 Cal. App. 3d at 290.

⁵⁷ Id. at 291.

⁵⁸ Bosley Med. Group v. Abramson, 161 Cal. App. 3d 284, 291 (2d Dist 1984).

⁵⁹ Id.

in a large clinic has little bargaining power vis-a-vis the purchaser of a clinic, since he or she is merely one of numerous equity holders with a minor ownership interest. Physicians in such situations may be more successful in arguing that the covenants-not-to-compete as applied against them are enforceable only if they comply with requirements of employment covenants.

In addition, the law of the local jurisdiction must be consulted to be certain the restrictive terms (e.g., time, geography) are reasonable.⁶⁹ Moreover, drafters should keep in mind that the stronger the argument that the covenant is part of the sale of assets, the more likely the purchaser will be able to enforce broader restrictions in the event physicians attempt to leave once the transaction has been consummated.

To ensure that a covenant is ancillary to the sale of the practice, the covenant should be included in the purchase documents. An additional covenant still may be required in the employment agreement in order to restrict physicians who leave once the covenant in the purchase documents has expired.⁶¹ For example, in the formation of a physician-hospital organization through a hospital's acquisition of a clinic's assets, which clinic remains in existence solely to function as the asset-less employer of the physicians, broader covenants-not-to-compete could be included in the asset purchase agreement between the hospital and clinic; on the ⁶⁹ The sale of a medical practice also must be structured so that it complies with the Federal Stark II, 42 U.S.C. §1395 (1996), and Anti-Kickback statutes, 42 U.S.C. §1320a-7b(b) (1996). Under these statutes, payment received for goodwill and other intangible assets (the value of which a covenant-not-to-compete serves to protect) could be characterized as illegal compensation or remuneration. To reduce the risk of violating these patient referral statutes, a buyer should obtain written opinions from qualified, independent appraisers that its acquisition is at fair market value and document its due diligence review of practice operations, earnings history and balance sheet assets. Similarly, a buyer should document any competing offers for the acquired practice.

⁶¹ As with the purchase of the a medical practice, see supra note 60, employment of a physician must also be structured to comply with Stark II and Anti-kickback statutes. For example, the latter statute contains an exception to its prohibitions where a bona fide employment relationship exists, see 42 U.S.C. §1320a-7b(a)(3) (1996); the regulations defining the term "employee" as used in this exception relies on the meaning used by the IRS, see 42 C.F.R. §1001.952(i) (1996)(citing 26 U.S.C. §3121(d)(2) (1996)), and thus a W-2 employment relationship is required. Similarly, Stark II provides an exception for employment arrangements where (1) the employment is for identifiable services; (2) The remuneration is consistent with fair market value for the services rendered and does not take into account the volume or value of referrals by the physician; (3) the agreement would be commercially reasonable even in the absence of any referrals to the employer; and (4) the employment meets the requirements of other applicable regulation. 42 U.S.C. §1395nn(e)(2) (1996).

otherhand, while the clinic could have narrower covenants in the employment contracts. A potential problem with this approach is that a court could conclude that the imposition of two different covenants against an individual is improper and overreaching. The law of the local jurisdiction should be reviewed to determine how to handle this issue.

Finally, in addition to covenants-not-to-compete, another method of promoting continued physician employment after consummation of a deal is through the use of a deferred purchase price or compensation arrangement. An asset purchase agreement can provide that, besides the purchase money paid at closing, a selling physician's interest in any deferred purchase price will vest incrementally over time after the deal closes. For example, the agreement could require that in order for a physician's share of the deferred purchase price to vest fully, the physician must remain employed by the new entity for a five year period.

CONCLUSION

At this point, a relatively small number of cases involving the hybrid situation exists in which a medical practice is sold and the selling physician becomes an employee of the buyer. However, from the cases reviewed above, it is clear that in integrating physicians and their practices into larger provider entities, parties must exercise caution in drafting covenants-not-to-compete physicians within whom they contract. An important consideration in determining the reasonableness of the covenant's terms will be the bargaining power of the covenantor-physicians, as well as the substance of the specific transaction in which the covenant is included.