Wearing Her Wrangler Jeans and Payless Penny Loafers

God is a Mexican woman driving across the San Diego-Tijuana border in a lightly dented and dusted 1980s sky blue Dodge Ram Van—a hand-me-down gift from a couple she nannied for in San Marino, California that still think of her as the most loving caregiver with that I-wish-she-would-have-stayed nostalgia, but she now has her own ten and eleven-year-old children, Miguelito and Gabriela, who sit in the back seat with a six-year-old boy from Hidalgo, Mexico, his small head resting on Miguelito's lap pretending to be asleep when Gabriela speaks in her accented English, answers how old she is, where she lives, what school she goes to, favorite subject, who the lady driving is—my mom, the boy sleeping—my little brother, and like that the patrol agent makes a hand gesture for them to pass through the gate where they will continue driving to the boy's parents waiting in Pomona.
My Grandfather Would Say

"After all, we all die, and God will be waiting for you; He won’t be looking at the holes on the bottoms of your shoes or the duct tape you cover them with when it rains.

He won’t compare your small stature—nourished on blocks of government cheese and powdered milk—to others because somehow it all disappears: shoes, cheese and milk, the duct tape. Only the tools that belonged to you will leave with you: the chisel and mallet of your heart, the ink coming off the page.

He will ask you to drop your shawl just like Juan Diego did, so the roses of your life, evidence that you loved, appear."

The day my grandfather died, his strong arms sank into the sides of his chest, tired, relieved; and his legs that once walked down rows of California orchards, collapsed.

That night, I dreamed his soul struggled as it inched its way out of his skin until his body looked like a pile of dirty work clothes.

I saw him ascend towards the dark dome of the sky, pass through one of the small openings I knew as a star, and stand at the top of a desert mountain. Then, he untied a white burlap sack from around his neck and let oranges, strawberries, and grapes fall to the ground.
