Introduction to Primary and Secondary Sources

Overview: Students will learn about primary and secondary sources.

Goal: Students will be able to analyze a source to help determine its authority, and differentiate between primary and secondary sources.

Objectives:

- Students will be able to differentiate between primary and secondary sources.
- Students will learn about the importance of determining a source’s authority.
- Students will practice determining source authority.

Investigative Question: How can we tell what is a primary source? How can we use them to help us understand the past?

Time required: 50 minutes – 1 hour

Recommended Grade Range: 4-6

Subject: Social studies; language arts; information literacy

Procedure:

1. Opening: (Connect, construct)
   a. I’m going to tell you that there is a way to categorize types of sources that we get information from into primary sources and secondary sources. Ask if anyone has heard those terms before.
   b. Explain that primary sources are original records of an event, created by someone who was there at that event. A secondary source is a secondhand account of an event that was created later by someone who did not experience the event.
   c. On board, make a T chart labeled “Primary sources” and “Secondary source.” Have students tell you examples of things they think would be primary verses secondary.

2. Wonder:
   a. Ask, how can we tell what is a primary source and what is a secondary source?
   b. Which do you think there would be more primary sources from, the Revolutionary War or the Civil War?
   c. What do you think is a more reliable source?
   d. Look at example, “Draft of Emancipation Proclamation” and discuss whether this is primary source.

3. Activity (Investigate, construct, express):
   a. You are going to look at some sources in groups and try to decide which ones are primary and which are secondary.
   b. Break students up into (up to seven) groups. Each group has a computer/device to look at the resources, or print outs. Each group also has the “What is a Primary Source” worksheet, which has columns for Titles of Primary, Secondary, and not sure.
   c. Look at one example together: Draft of the Emancipation Proclamation.
   d. Give groups time to look at items and discuss, monitoring their discussion.
   e. When groups are done, ask them to share. Make sure each group shares at least once, asking questions: Who wants to explain why they thought a source was primary/secondary? (The groups can pick which from their selection to share). If they had some that they were unsure of, ask why they were unsure and what information would have helped them decide.

4. Review (Connect, reflect):
   a. Look at other side “What is a Primary Source?” worksheet and go through together, adding other sources they think would fit in each category.
b. Ask if they have any questions or other things they wonder about.

Evaluation

The evaluation for this activity is informal. The teacher will listen to small group discussions about the sources as well as how they divide up their sources. The teacher will also use the whole group discussion after the activity, and listen to the ideas that students have about what makes a primary and secondary source.

Reflection on Primary Sources Introduction Lesson

I taught my lesson to a class of fifth graders in a 30-minute period. Overall, I thought it went quite well. When I originally designed the lesson, I expected the students to not have much, if any, background knowledge about primary and secondary sources, so this was intended to be an introduction. This year, the reading curriculum did touch on primary and secondary sources, so at least some of the students did recognize the terms and have some understanding. Still, the lesson provided a good way to have them examine, interact with, and discuss primary documents. They left with a better understanding of the differences between primary and secondary documents, and gained practice in thinking critically about the sources.

I am not sure whether I think having students look at the documents as printed out copies versus on a iPad would make a difference, but I do feel that it worked will to have them access the documents through links. I divided the resources into groups and put links to each resource on a blog, so the students would be able to access them easily on either iPads or laptops. This worked fairly well. There were a couple of instances where the links were not valid, either due to my error or because of the Library of Congress website changing. So, before I would do this lesson again, I will check for accuracy in those links. In some cases I helped the students find what they were supposed to be looking at by simply searching LOC.gov.

I would have liked to have more time for further discussion right after they examined the documents, but our schedules did not permit for that. We did review it the following week and the discussion included how it can be difficult to tell what is a primary document, especially with paintings and sketches. We also talked about biases in all kinds of sources. I think elementary school students need practice and instruction in thinking about their sources and learn to evaluate, and this lesson provided an opportunity for them to do that.

This lesson was at the beginning of their research on the Civil War. Students demonstrated their learning by creating letters or journal entries. Students learned about how journals and letters were an important part of the lives of those who experienced the Civil War. They examined letters and other primary sources and saw how soldiers and other key figures recorded their experiences and corresponded with their families and loved ones. Students then needed to choose three people or type of people from Civil War times and write letters or journal articles from before, during, and after the war. Types of people included a slave plantation owner, Union/Confederate soldier at a specific battle, a Southerner after reading the Emancipation Proclamation, a spy, a nurse, etc. The students were creative in their letters or journal entries and the classroom teachers were very pleased with how this went. Students displayed their letters on a tri-fold board or in a presentation on an iPad or laptop for their parents to see. It was definitely helpful for students to view and examine actual letters from the Civil War to help with this assignment.
What is a Primary Source?

Directions: As a group, look at each of the resources and write the titles of them under the category you think they belong to. If you are not sure, write it under “Not sure” but explain why, or what information you would need to help you decide.

Primary

Secondary

Not sure (explain what you would need to help you decide)
What is a Primary Source?

A Primary Source is an original record of an event, created by someone who participated or witnessed that event. Primary sources offer a variety of points of view and perspectives of events, issues, people, and places.

Primary sources include:

- Letters
- Photographs
- Maps
- Journals
- Art / Sketches
- Sound recordings
- Newspaper articles
- Physical objects (clothes, tools, etc.)

Just because an item is listed above does not mean it is automatically a primary source. The important thing to remember is they were used or created by someone with firsthand experience of an event.

What is a Secondary Source?

A Secondary Source is a secondhand account of an event that was created later by someone who did not experience the event. It may use primary sources as examples or explain or analyze primary sources.

Secondary sources include:

- Textbooks
- Encyclopedias
- Biographies
- Books
- Art
- Newspapers
