Abstract: The Analogous Constitutional Protection of Race and Sexual Preference: Recognizing the Shared Vulnerability

Because there is a growing interest in legal rights for gay persons, courts will soon be forced to address this important issue head on. Courts will have to decide whether sexual orientation meets the requirements of a suspect classification. This article aspires to provide guidance for courts that can no longer sidestep the question of whether sexual orientation is a suspect classification. The analysis compares race and sexual orientation, examining the thinking process whereby race and sexual orientation share the vulnerability associated with the human attributes that the requirements of a suspect classification are expected to meet.
The U.S. Constitution upholds multiple values, including justice, efficiency, and liberty, as well as the interests that are integral to those values. For example, when courts conclude that race is an attribute that deserves the protection we offer to vulnerable members of our community, they do so because of the intrinsic unfairness implicit in permitting a citizen to experience disparate treatment as a result of characteristics over which they lack discretion. However, the apparent justice in such a judgment conflicts with individualism, arguably the central value of American life.

The American legal system's theory of responsibility is decidedly individualistic, rooted in the ideas of John Locke and an individualistic American culture. Individualism, as the term is used here, refers to the assumption that humans do and should make decisions that determine the course of their life. Emerging from this assumption is an emphasis on individual responsibility as an expectation and prescription. Individual responsibility produces rulings that hold individuals accountable for what are considered to be the reasonable effects of their decisions. Individualism, refers to the belief that the individual is responsible for his or her own condition, whether comfortable or miserable. In America, there is a unique fascination with individualism and the emphasis on rational determination of the course of one's life that it encourages. The presumption of individuals' capability to order their world results in a generalized hesitancy to "harm" citizens by extending compassionate assistance to them.

In Democracy in America, Alexis de Tocqueville labeled what he observed in America as "individualism." Tocqueville argues that American individualists are often blind to the organic needs of society. Because American's hold themselves responsible for their own destiny, they attribute their individual responsibility model onto others. This attribution ensures that everyone is held responsible for their own actions, be they laudable or morally reprehensible.

Examining the moral reasoning and decision making of American children further highlights the extensive reach of American individualism. In a study of Filipino and American children, Alison Carson and Ali Banuazizi found that American children's resource allocation decisions were likely to be based on merit as opposed to need. Regardless of the type of need

He references the Protestant's rampant distrust of the radical individual, as well as their strong focus on the community and social cohesion to point out that America was not founded on the value of individual responsibility. Moreover, Shain highlights the civic republican tradition our founding fathers built our nation upon to illustrate another case where the individual is deemphasized in favor of the collective good.).

OF CROSS-CULTURAL PSYCH.*., 39(4), 493-514 (2008). In an effort to examine the relationship between cultural norms and resource distribution among 151 Filipino (generally collectivist) and American (generally considered individualistic) fifth graders, Carson and Banuazizi expressed, the child awarding the resources was more likely to choose the individual who had worked hardest (and/or met the goal). From a very early age, American children are taught that individuals should be responsible for themselves.

In Romer v. Evans, the Court addressed the constitutionality of Colorado’s Amendment 2 with pervasive individualism serving as an undercurrent. This amendment, approved by a voter referendum, barred any state action that protected lesbians, gay men, and bisexuals from discrimination. It further repealed various city ordinances that prohibited sexual orientation discrimination. The court explicitly avoided the issue of whether sexual orientation deserves heightened scrutiny.

developed two scenarios. The scenarios each contained a child who had done a great amount of work and a child who had great need. The children were asked to determine how a reward should be distributed. Although the Filipino and American children both favored equality based distributions first, the American children were more likely to make their decision based on equity (37.9% in first scenario and 23.0% in the second). The Filipino children were more likely to make their decision based on need (47.9% in the first scenario and 42.3% in the second). The Filipino children were more likely than their American counterparts to consider the outcomes associated with their allocation recommendation. Negative feelings and potential conflict (which this author attributes to cultural norms emphasizing the need to maintain smooth interpersonal relations) were mentioned by the majority of Filipino participants. The American participants did not concern themselves with the relational outcomes.

No Protected Status Based on Homosexual, Lesbian or Bisexual Orientation. Neither the State of Colorado, through any of its branches or departments, nor any of its agencies, political subdivisions, municipalities or school districts, shall enact, adopt or enforce any statute, regulation, ordinance or policy whereby homosexual, lesbian or bisexual orientation, conduct, practices or relationships shall constitute or otherwise be the basis of or entitle any person or class of persons to have or claim any minority status, quota preferences, protected status or claim of discrimination. This Section of the Constitution shall be in all respects self-executing.

under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In avoiding this issue, the Court held that the proposed amendment failed to pass constitutional muster even under rational basis review. In a 6-to-3 decision, the Court held that Amendment 2 of the Colorado State Constitution violated the equal protection clause. The amendment had denied homosexual and bisexual persons the right to seek and receive specific legal protection from discrimination. Justice Kennedy indicated that a law can be upheld under the equal protection clause, even if it seems to disadvantage a specific group, so long as it can be shown to “advance a legitimate government interest.” Amendment 2, by depriving persons of equal protection under the law due to their sexual orientation failed to advance such a legitimate interest.

The Romer decision, however, was not the first instance in which the Court has avoided determining the level of review for homosexuals. In Lawrence v. Texas, the Court had to determine the constitutionality of sodomy laws that the Court had upheld in Bowers v. Hardwick. Instead of deciding whether or not sexual orientation is a suspect class or the level of review gay persons would be provided in equal protection lawsuits, the Court in Lawrence completely side-stepped the equal protection issue. In ignoring the equal protection issue,

This article aspires to provide guidance for courts that can no longer side-step the question of whether sexual orientation is a suspect classification. The analysis compares race and sexual orientation by examining their similar human attributes that require suspect classification protections.

Part I of this article provides an overview of the Equal Protection Clause. This part is followed by an explication of suspect classes, indicating the requirements of a suspect class and a brief review of the groups currently recognized as such. Part III of this article will demonstrate how sexual orientation meets the requirements of a suspect class. Part IV examines equal protection of homosexuality under Canada’s Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Part V concludes that laws that discriminate against homosexuals should be held to the same strict scrutiny as laws that discriminate on the basis of race.

I. EQUAL PROTECTION PRIMER

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution holds that no state shall deprive any person of the equal protection of the laws.19 This amendment requires that similarly situated people should be treated alike.20 By adhering to this mandate, the United States Supreme Court has found that the Equal Protection Clause was enacted to guarantee nothing less than abolition of all cast and invidious class-based legislation.21 To achieve this end, the court has developed a three-tiered hierarchy of equal protection review to determine whether a governmental purpose is adequate to justify use of the discriminatory classification in question.22

21 Id. at 213.
22 Watkins v. U. S. Army, 885 F. 2d 699, 712 (9th Cir. 1989).
The first standard of review, and the most deferential, is rational basis.\textsuperscript{23} Rational basis review requires the party challenging the statute to bear the burden of proof.\textsuperscript{24} Under this standard, legislative enactments enjoy a presumption of constitutionality as long as the classification is rationally related to a legitimate state interest.\textsuperscript{25} Rational basis review applies to legislative enactments relating to nearly all economic and commercial legislation.\textsuperscript{26}

Under rational basis scrutiny, a court determines whether the classifications drawn in a statute are reasonable in connection to the purpose of the statute.\textsuperscript{27} By requiring a nexus between the classifications and the legislative purpose, courts ensure that the purpose of the classification is not to burden the disadvantaged groups.\textsuperscript{28} This relationship does not have to be demonstrated with precise certainty but should not be so attenuated as to render the distinction arbitrary or irrational.\textsuperscript{29}

The second standard of review is intermediate scrutiny.\textsuperscript{30} Legislation implicating a quasi-suspect classification is subject to this level of review, essentially requiring that the legislation be substantially related to an important governmental interest.\textsuperscript{31} Gender and legitimacy are two recognizable quasi-suspect classifications.\textsuperscript{32}

\begin{flushright}
28 Fritz, 449 U.S. at 181 (Stevens, J. concurring).
\end{flushright}
The Supreme Court has never explained why certain factors are significant in determining what classes are deserving of quasi-suspect status. Courts have considered the following factors in determining whether a class is deserving of quasi-suspect status: (1) discrete and insular minority, (2) immutability, (3) stereotypes and stigmas, and (4) political powerlessness. Courts are willing to extend additional protection than rational basis review when it is evident that a group would suffer discrimination and would be unlikely to overcome such discrimination. This additional protection is classifying certain groups as quasi-suspect.

Intermediate scrutiny shifts the burden of proof from the party challenging the legislative enactment to the government. The government bears the burden of proof because courts are better able to determine whether legislative enactments are based in animus directed at a particular group.

40 Cleburne, 473 U.S. at 440. The Court in Cleburne stated, the general rule is that legislation is presumed to be valid and will be sustained if the classification drawn by the statute is rationally related to a legitimate state interest. The general rule gives way, however, when a statute classifies by race, alienage, or national origin. These factors are so seldom relevant to the achievement of any legitimate state interest that laws grounded in such considerations are deemed to reflect prejudice and antipathy - a view that those in the class are not as worthy or deserving as others. For these reasons . . . these laws are subjected to strict scrutiny and will be sustained only if they are suitably tailored to serve a compelling state interest.

Id. This judicial oversight is necessary when discrimination is unlikely to be timely resolved by legislative means. Id.
The third standard of review is strict scrutiny. Government acts implicating a suspect classification or explicitly burdening a fundamental right are subject to strict judicial scrutiny and must be narrowly tailored to further a compelling governmental interest. For this standard, the government bears the burden of proof. In justifying strict scrutiny, the Court in Plyler held,

Some classifications are more likely than others to reflect deep-seated prejudice rather than legislative rationality in pursuit of some legitimate objective. Legislation predicated on such prejudice is easily recognized as incompatible with the constitutional understanding that each person is to be judged individually and is entitled to equal justice under the law. Classifications treated as suspect tend to be irrelevant to any proper legislative goal.

Under the Equal Protection Clause, courts apply some heightened level of scrutiny where there are reasons to suspect prejudice against a discrete and insular minority, which tends to limit the operation of those political processes to be relied upon to protect minorities. Courts apply a high level of scrutiny because there is a presumption that classifications that burden some politically powerless groups are likely to reflect antipathy against such groups and that such classifications are inherently suspect. Thus they require being strict scrutiny. John Hart Ely noted that the doctrine of suspect classifications is a way of revealing official attempts to impose inequality for its own sake. The concept of suspect classification is also a way to uncover official attempts to treat a particular group worse not in the service of overriding social goals but for the sake of simply disadvantaging its members.

Certain classifications are presumptively not permitted on the ground that they are illegitimate. Nelson Tibbe and Deborah Widiss, Equal Access and the Right to Marry, 158 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1375, 1407 (2010). Because these classifications are presumptively disallowed, they must be justified by the state with doubts and ambiguities resolved against the government. Id. Race, national origin, and alienage are among the classifications that must be justified by a compelling state interest under the strict scrutiny standard of review. Id.

II. SUSPECT CLASSIFICATIONS AND THE INDICIA OF SUSPECT CLASSIFICATION STATUS

The Supreme Court has recognized race, alienage, and national origin as suspect classifications. In this paper, we will argue that sexual orientation deserves inclusion in this list. This section will demonstrate how sexual orientation meets the criteria for determining whether a group is suspect. First we discuss 46 Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 216 n. 14 (1982). Courts will view certain classifications "with skepticism, if not a jaundiced eye" in part because certain classifications are likely to be the result of animus rather than a desire to promote legitimate state goals, and in part because the normal correction mechanism within the political process may not operate fairly when these groups are involved. the appropriateness of race as analogous due to the immutability of race and sexual orientation. Then we will independently discuss each factor that the courts use to determine whether a class is suspect and show how sexual orientation fulfills each element.

We argue that race provides an appropriate basis for comparison because both race and sexual orientation are immutable characteristics.\textsuperscript{52} Alienage, is less relevant as a comparator because alienage is not an immutable\textsuperscript{53} trait, although arguably it meets all the other indicia of being a suspect classification.\textsuperscript{54}

Supp. 417, 437 (S.D. Ohio 1994), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 943 (1998). In this case, the court relied on credible and unrebutted evidence concluding that sexual orientation is an immutable characteristic that is beyond the individual's control. \textit{Id}. Various state courts have determined that sexual orientation is an immutable characteristic resulting in these courts using a heightened level of review. See, e.g., Varnum v. Brien, 763 N.W. 2d 862, 892 (Iowa 2009). See also Kenji Yoshino, Suspect Symbols: The Literary Argument for Heightened Scrutiny for Gays, 96 Colum. L. Rev. 1753, 1831 (1996). \textsuperscript{53} An immutable trait is one that is unchangeable. Strictly speaking, alienage is not an immutable characteristic because one can always become a citizen. Thomas, Simon, Democracy and Social Injustice: Law, Politics and Philosophy, at 7 (1995)

The court noted that alienage is not immutable because aliens can become citizens. \textit{Id}. \textit{Assuming, arguendo, that religion is a suspect classification, religion is not analogous to sexual...
However, some scholars do argue that race does not provide this basis for comparison because sexual orientation is a mutable characteristic. These scholars adopt the view that sexual orientation is a choice.

55 See, e.g., Devon Carbado, Black Rights, Gay Rights, Civil Rights, 47 UCLA L. Rev. 1467, 1480 (2000). John Butler, perhaps the most distinguished black American military sociologist, espoused the view that race is a static identity and that sexual orientation is a changeable lifestyle. Id. at 1479. Butler argued that the comparison between sexual orientation and race is tantamount to comparing a characteristic that is achieved with one that is ascribed or comparing a choice in expressed lifestyle with one that is not a choice. Id. at 1481. Dean Byrd, Homosexuality: Innate or Immutable?, 14 Regent U. L. Rev. 383, 388 (2001-2012). Simon Levay, who found subtle but important differences between the brains of homosexual men and heterosexual men, stressed that he did not prove that homosexuality is genetic or find a genetic cause for being gay. Id. Levay also noted that he did not prove that gay men are born gay. Id. J. M. Bailey and R. C. Pillard conducted another study concluding that environmental factors significantly contribute to sexual orientation. Id. at 390. Lynn D. Dean Hamer, the author of the “Gay Gene” study, noted that homosexuality is not purely genetic and environmental factors play a role. Id. Hamer further explained that there is not a single gene that makes people gay. Id.

56 See, e.g., Janet Halley, Sexual Orientation and the Politics of Biology: A Critique of the Argument from Immutability, 46 Stan. L. Rev. 503, 517 (1994). Anti-gay activists assert that homosexuality is a chosen lifestyle. Id. This assertion assumes that homosexuality is not a sexual orientation. Id. This assertion further assumes that homosexuality is a lifestyle constituted of sexual acts. Id.
The debate surrounding immutability of sexual preferences is crucial for this discussion. Should someone relying on the traditional meme of individualism conclude that sexual preference is a choice, it follows that the consequences of that choice are themselves the responsibility of the chooser. But claiming that sexual preference is a choice is incorrect for multiple reasons. The first reason is extensive evidence that sexual orientation is genetic, biological, and inherent. Secondly, even if sexual orientation is not genetic, for purposes of constitutional law, homosexuality is an immutable characteristic because it cannot be changed without involving substantial difficulty or cost. For gays and lesbians to change or be forced to change their orienta-

Although these doctors and scientists have not prove that there is a definitive cause for homosexuality, they nevertheless conclude that homosexuality is beyond an individual’s control and that it is unlikely to change. Id. While there is no definitive proof that homosexuality is completely genetic, there is, however, no definitive proof that homosexuality is the result of social factors. Id. at 557. tion would be at an immense psychological cost. Lastly, sexual orientation is immutable because it is so integral to a person's identity that it would be unreasonable for the government to penalize a person for refusing to change.

The immutability element, however, is but one factor courts look at in determining whether a class is suspect. Other factors courts consider in granting suspect status are: (1) whether the group is a discrete and insular minority, (2) whether the group has been subjected to historical discrimination, (3) whether the group has faced social stigmatization, (4) whether the group is politically powerless, and (5) whether the trait has any connection to the individual's ability to contribute to society.

A. Discrete and Insular Minority

It is imperative to first note that there is no commonly accepted definition of the terms "discrete" and "insular." Professor Bruce Ackerman, however, provided the most widely accepted explanation for the terms "discrete and insular" minor-

REV. 135, 148-49 (2011). In early cases, courts conclusorily stated that a particular group was or was not discrete and insular. Id. Because courts failed to define these terms, it is unclear what must be established for a court to consider a group discrete and insular. Id. at 149.
ity. Professor Ackerman defined discreteness as a visible characteristic. That is, a group is discrete if it is visible in a way that makes the group relatively easy for others to identify. A group is insular if it tends to interact with other members of the group with great frequency in a variety of social contexts.

Race is a discrete minority because racial minorities exhibit visible and identifiable characteristics. Skin color is an immediately obvious and permanent characteristic present at birth. African-American individuals, for example, are perceived as such based on their skin color. Even if they wanted to, many blacks could not pass for white because their physiognomies proclaim them to be black in a society that has given that label to people containing certain characteristics.

Sexual orientation is also a discrete minority because gay people have distinguishing and obvious characteristics classifying them as a distinct group. Although gay people are identifiable, they are coerced to conceal their status to avoid discrimination.\textsuperscript{77} Many gay people are afraid to disclose their sexual differences to a society that labels their behavior unacceptable.\textsuperscript{78}

Scholars argue that race does not provide a basis for comparison because race is a visible characteristic.\textsuperscript{79} Specifically, scholars argue that gay people have a choice not to reveal their sexual orientation. 80 Racial minorities, however, do not have this same choice because race is usually revealed by appearance. 81 Because gay people have a choice not to disclose their sexuality, they can avoid discrimination in a way that most racial minorities cannot. 82 This proposition ignores the fact that race can be visibly hidden, it is somewhat susceptible to change, and it is sometimes culturally determined. 83 That is, race is not always visibly clear. For example, miscegenation statutes claimed "one drop" made a person African American, but the one drop was not always ascertainable. 84 Although their blood would classify them as otherwise, African Americans have "passed" as white. 85

Race is an insular minority because there are many settings that are vital sources of affirming the identity of racial minorities. There is a litany of interest groups that cater to the needs of racial minorities. Some of these groups are: National Conference of Black Mayors; national civil rights organizations; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Congressional Black Caucus; Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund; Puerto Rican Defense Fund; and Black Women Organized for Political Action. Irrespective of these groups, racial minorities interact with other racial minorities with great frequency, especially because white and black Americans often still live apart from each other.

Commentators argue that gay people do not arise to the same level of insularity as do racial minorities. The proffered reason is that gay people have a few social contexts that serve as the center of activity for reaffirmation of gay identities. These contexts that serve as loci for the reaffirmation of gay identity are most notably bars and restaurants found in major American cities.93

Gay people, however, are also insular because they have a broad range of sociological settings that are important sources of reaffirming gay identity.94 In the 1980s, especially in major cities, the range of sources of gay networking clearly went beyond the gay bars and restaurants that were once the only public meeting places for gay persons.95 National publications such as Gayellow Pages noted the massive growth of gay-affiliated political organizations.96 Gayellow Pages also evidenced the huge growth of gay-affiliated counseling centers, businesses, lawyers, public accommodations, and health care, religious, educational, and entertainment services.97 These affiliations support the concept of "gay minority."98

Alternatively, courts consider several factors in determining whether a group constitutes a discrete and insular minority deserving the benefit of heightened scrutiny.99 These factors include: (1) whether the group's defining characteristic is immutable, (2) whether the group has suffered a history of discrimination, (3) whether the group is in a position of political powerlessness, (4) whether the group's defining characteristic relates in any way to the individual's ability to participate in and contribute to society, and (5) whether the characteristic is be-

B. History of Discrimination

It is axiomatic that racial minorities have been subjected to a history of discrimination. This discrimination was evident in the institution of slavery, which stripped Black Americans of all their human, civil, political, and social rights. One can never forget the huge amount of lynching that occurred in the south.

The landmark case of Dred Scott v. Sanford held that even if Blacks were “free,” they were not “citizens” of the United States. This ruling was not overturned until the passage of the Thirteenth and the Fourteenth Amendments in 1865 and 1868 respectively. These amendments emancipated Blacks, expressly granted them citizenship status, and sought to protect their civil rights. It was not until 1870 when blacks were extended the political rights of citizenship through the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment, which gave them the right to vote.

Despite the fact that blacks were endowed with certain rights as citizens, they endured years of racism and segregation due to laws mandating segregation passed in the late 1880s and 1890s. The Supreme Court affirmed one of these laws in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson. The law in Plessy was a Louisiana statute requiring separate railway cars for blacks and whites. The court in Plessy established the "separate but equal" rule to justify segregation.

Without much judicial resistance, state legislative bodies continued to enact a slew of race-based laws. The preclusion of individuals based on race remained uncontested until Korematsu v. United States. After the attack on Pearl Harbor, the Supreme Court affirmed the conviction of a Japanese American for violating a civilian exclusion order. This order mandated the exclusion of all persons of Japanese ancestry from a designated military area.

The approval, however, of legal restrictions that violated the civil rights of a racial group was ephemeral.117 During the 1952 term, the Supreme Court began scrutinizing the premise of the "separate but equal" doctrine.118 The Court reviewed five cases that contested the Plessy "separate but equal" doctrine in public education.119 In Brown v. Board of Education,120 the court held that "in the field of education the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place."121

Even after Brown, blacks still faced discrimination through the prohibition of interracial marriage.122 If a black person attempted to marry a white person, both parties faced criminal charges.123 It was not until 1967, in the case of Loving v. Virginia,124 when the laws barring interracial marriage were

Shortly after the marriage, the Lovings returned to Virginia. Id. at 3. Subsequently, the Lovings were charged with violating a state statute banning interracial marriage. Id. at 3. The Lovings pleaded guilty to the charge and were sentenced to one year in prison. Id. The trial judge, however, suspended the sentence on the condition that the Lovings leave Virginia for 25 years. Id. This judge stated, Opponents of the comparison between race and homosexuality posit that the economic and social consequences of discrimination are much more severe for racial minorities than for homosexuals. Even if the discrimination against racial minorities is more severe than the discrimination against gay persons, one still cannot deny the fact that homosexuals and racial minorities have been, and continue to be, the target of purposeful and pernicious discrimination. This discrimination against homosexuals is apparent in many aspects.

Almighty God created the races white, black, yellow, malay and red, and he placed them on separate continents. And but for the interference with his arrangement there would be no cause for such marriages. The fact that he separated the races shows that he did not intend for the races to mix.

After their convictions, the Lovings moved to the District of Columbia. The Lovings filed a motion to vacate the judgment and set aside the sentence on the ground that the statutes, which they had violated, were violative of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court held that there was no doubt that restricting the freedom to marry on the basis of racial classifications violated the essence of the Equal Protection Clause. The court further held that the Virginia statute was in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In so doing, the court noted that the freedom to marry is recognized as a vital personal right essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men.
First, The United States has criminalized homosexual conduct in the past.\textsuperscript{129} North Carolina's "crime against nature" had long criminalized oral or anal sex regardless of the gender or age of the participants and the location of the act.\textsuperscript{130} Before the landmark case of \textit{Lawrence v. Texas},\textsuperscript{131} eight states had changed the "crime against nature" to criminalize only same sex acts.\textsuperscript{132} One of the most significant cases that pertains to the criminalization of homosexual conduct is \textit{Bowers v. Hardwick}.\textsuperscript{133} In \textit{Bowers}, Michael Hardwick was arrested in his own bedroom for making love with another consenting adult and charged with sodomy.\textsuperscript{134} Though Hardwick was not prosecuted, he filed a federal civil rights challenge to the statute, arguing that it violated his fundamental right of privacy.\textsuperscript{135}

Writing for a majority of five, Justice White concluded that the constitutional right of privacy did not extend to homosexual sodomy.\textsuperscript{136} Essential to the majority's treatment of the case was its claim that homosexual sodomy has always beenviewed as criminal; it was a criminal offense at common law and was criminalized by the first thirteen colonies at the time they ratified the Bill of Rights.\textsuperscript{137} Justice White's opinion relied on the asserted antiquity of proscriptions against homosexual sodomy to understand Hardwick's conduct. Justice White cited ancient proscriptions to demonstrate that the framers could not have intended the Bill of Rights or the Fourteenth Amendment to protect Hardwick's homosexual sodomy and to support White's view that homosexual sodomy is sinful and immoral. Because homosexuality is sinful and immoral, Justice White asserted that homosexuality is now, as it always has been, properly punished by the criminal law.

Second, homosexuals were dismissed from military service because of their sexual orientation. Until recently, homosexuals were not allowed to openly serve in the military because of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell (DADT)." DADT, which was a federal statute and military policy, prohibited recruiters from asking individuals about their sexual orientation and prevented gay service members from disclosing their sexual orientation through word or deed. DADT barred gay service members from (1) engaging in homosexual acts, (2) stating that they are homosexual, or (3) marrying a person of the same sex. The policy behind DADT was the proposition that permitting the service of individuals who have an inclination to engage in homosexual acts would create an unacceptable risk to the high standards of morale, good order and discipline, and unit cohesion that are the essence of military capability.

Third, gay persons have been victims, and continue to be victims, of a significant number of hate crimes in the United States.\(^\text{146}\) As an example, Jamie Nabozny entered the seventh grade and at that time he realized he was gay.\(^\text{147}\) Unfortunately, Jamie’s classmates also realized that Jamie was gay.\(^\text{148}\) Consequently, Jamie was frequently called “faggot” and he was spat upon on many occasions.\(^\text{149}\) This harassment, however, escalated culminating in a physical attack during class.\(^\text{150}\) After the teacher stepped out of the room, two male students grabbed Jamie, pushed him to the floor, held him down, and performed a mock rape on him.\(^\text{151}\) No disciplinary action was taken.\(^\text{152}\) Unfortunately, this attack was not the only attack. Another attack resulted in Jamie suffering internal bleeding.\(^\text{153}\)

It would be comforting to think that the attack on Matthew Shephard and Jamie’s experience were just rare, isolated events, but unfortunately they were not. Gay youth are more likely than their straight peers to be victims of violence at school. The U.S. Justice Department reports that homosexuals are probably the most frequent victims of hate crimes. The Federal Bureau of Investigation maintains statistics indicating that in 2008 17.6% of the victims of hate crimes were targeted based on their sexual orientation. According to the Centers for Disease Control, one in six gay and lesbian teenagers is beaten up so badly during high school that they require medical attention.

C. Social Stigmatization

Racial minorities have been subjected to incorrect stereotyping and social stigmatization. African-American men, for example, are perceived by society as being more dangerous, more prone to violence, and more likely to be criminals or gang members than other members of society. A harsh reality is that crime has become a metaphor to describe young black men. Because blacks are seen as criminals, people generally perceive acts to be violent when a Black person engages in these acts and benign when a non-Black person engages in the same acts. Blacks are also treated as if they are all potential thieves. Most blacks have been denied entry to a store, closely watched, snubbed, questioned about their ability to pay for an item, or stopped and detained for shoplifting.

A stereotype that Asian Americans face is that people associate Asian Americans with foreignness. This stereotype is still evident today. To illustrate, two Asian Americans, who were associated with the O.J. Simpson trial and who spoke without a noticeable accent, were portrayed as bumbling, heavily-accented Asians who were unable to speak English. The Asian-as-foreigner stereotype takes on harsh ramifications. In 1982, Ronald Ebens and Michael Nitz, two White Detroit autoworkers, struck Vincent Chin, a Chinese American, to death with a baseball bat. While beating Vincent, the two perpetrators called him a “Nip” and accused him of contributing to the loss of jobs in the automobile industry.171

Similar to Asian Americans, Latino Americans are associated with foreignness.172 Some people also perceive Latino Americans, if they are brown-skinned persons who speak English with a Spanish accent, as illegal immigrants.173 This perception is bolstered if those Latino Americans are unskilled or employed as domestic or menial laborers.174 Young male Latinos also face another stereotype because they are assumed to be gang members.175 There is an ironic connection between the Latino-as-criminal stereotype and the Latino-as-illegal immigrant stereotype because illegal aliens are considered lawbreakers.176

Homosexuals are subjected to equally harsh stereotypes.177 One of the most common stereotypes of homosexuals is that they actively recruit children to homosexuality.178 Part of their alleged strategy in this regard is presenting role models that make homosexuality appear attractive to young children.179 This proposition, however, has no basis in fact.180 To elucidate, homosexuals do not attempt to convert children, nor will exposure to a gay person affect a child’s sexual orientation.181 orientation is established early in life and cannot be consciously acquired.\(^{182}\)

The most offensive stereotype is that homosexuals are more likely to molest children than are heterosexuals.\(^{183}\) Officials used this misperception to justify sodomy statutes and employment discrimination.\(^{184}\) In fact, the average homosexual is neither likely to molest children nor more likely than a heterosexual to be a child molester.\(^{185}\)

Another stereotype is that homosexuals are mentally ill.\(^{186}\) Because people think that homosexuality is a mental disease, there is an idea that homosexuals are inferior or unstable.\(^{187}\) The reality is that homosexuals who have come to terms with their homosexuality are no more distressed psychologically than are heterosexuals.\(^{188}\) Homosexuality is not indicative of psychopathology.\(^{189}\)

D. Political Powerless

To determine whether a group is politically powerless, courts must ascertain whether a particular group is respected in our nation’s legislatures.190 Put another way, courts must determine whether a group’s interests are fully taken into account in the majoritarian process.191 The political powerlessness of a group is indicative of “a social and cultural isolation that gives the majority little reason to respect or be concerned with that group’s interests and needs.”192

For centuries, legislatures have not respected racial minorities and the majoritarian process has not taken into account the interests of these racial minorities.193 The lack of respect of the legislature is evident by the fact that blacks have faced a history of invidious discrimination.194 By example, de jure segregation has been on the books for centuries.195 It was accepted that blacks and whites were not allowed to drink from the same water fountains,196 blacks and whites were not allowed to sit on

Other racial minorities have been disrespected by the legislature.\textsuperscript{202} Japanese Americans, for example, were excluded from occupying a particular part of the country and were subject to a curfew.\textsuperscript{203} More recently, racial minorities could have faced an unreasonable search at any time in Arizona.\textsuperscript{204} Anyone suspected of being an illegal immigrant could have been compelled to show a photo identification.\textsuperscript{205} their choice in a significant number of states, permitted to adopt children, or allowed to enter the military.

It is even more apparent that homosexuals were not respected by the legislature when there was a law on the books that barred the adoption of anti-discrimination laws against individuals based on their sexual orientation. The most recent example of the lack of respect in the legislature comes from Mike Reynolds, a representative in Oklahoma. Mr. Reynolds is pushing a bill in Oklahoma that would bar homosexuals from openly serving in the state's national guard.

Courts have also considered the direct representation of minorities in our government in determining whether a group is politically powerless. Racial minorities were substantially underrepresented in Congress and state legislatures. Although there was a national voting age population of 11.1% black, they constituted 4.9% of members of Congress and 5.4% of all state legislators. Despite the fact that there was a national voting age population of 7.3% Hispanic, they made up 2.5% of Congress and 1.7% of state legislators. Since the 1990 Census, state legislatures and federal and state courts adopted new redistricting plans producing some of the largest increases in minority representation.

Irrespective of these gains, minority representation in Congress and state legislatures did not surpass the minority population percentages and still failed to provide proportional representation.221

Homosexuals are also underrepresented in our government.222 It is estimated that there are about five to ten percent of homosexuals in this country.223 There were three openly gay members in the 111th Congress.224

One cannot dispute the immense benefits that flow from having gay representation in our legislative bodies.225 The presence of openly gay legislators creates respect for homosexuals within that legislative body.226 The greater the number of openly gay representatives serving in a legislative body, the more opportunities there are for non-gay legislators to interact with homosexuals and gain a better understanding of the gay community.227

Another benefit of having openly gay legislatures is they are motivated to champion legislation, specifically designed to benefit and protect the gay community.228 The reason is openly gay legislatures have a direct understanding of the experience and needs of the gay community. Openly gay legislators are also more likely to identify the impact of legislation, which on its face, does not specifically address the gay community. This is vital because non-gay legislators are less cognizant of and sensitive to the needs and concerns of the gay community.

E. Ability To Contribute To Society

Research provides support for the proposition that race bears no relation to a person’s ability to participate and contribute to society. This proposition is evident in the fact that blacks comprise ten percent of the workforce. Based on 1990 Census figures, there are approximately 425,000 Black-owned businesses. Other blacks who do not own their businesses hold positions of physicians, lawyers, accountants, college professors, structural metal workers, and firefighters.

In 1998, African Americans and Hispanics made up 12.5% of all professionals. This percentage includes 14.3% of accountants, 9.7% of physicians, 9.4% of college and university teachers, and 7.9% of engineers. African Americans and Hispanics also made up 7% of lawyers, 4.8% of dentists, and 6.9% of natural scientists.

Racial minorities participate in society in a number of other ways. For example, African Americans and Hispanics hold public elective offices. Despite holding public offices, racial minorities live, go to school, play, and worship in the same way as European Americans. Racial minorities are also similar to European Americans because racial minorities pay taxes, get married, and raise their families.

Similarly, significant case law provides support for the notion that sexual orientation bears no relation to an individual’s ability to participate and contribute to society. This proposition is Legislation treating LGBTs differently is often motivated by prejudice or an inaccurate stereotype even when there is no real difference in the ability of homosexuals compared to heterosexuals.

By example, there is no real difference between children raised by gay parents than children raised by straight parents. Overall, studies show that the differences between children raised by homosexuals and those raised by heterosexuals are few. There is also no difference between homosexuals' and heterosexuals' ability to serve in the military. More specifically, there is no visible data supporting the conclusion that gays and lesbians cannot acceptably serve in the military. In fact, a significant number of gays have served and continue to serve in the military with distinction. Studies show that homosexuals not only serve in the military, but most of them do so without incident and receive honorable discharges at the conclusion of their service.

Although there is no difference between homosexuals and heterosexuals, people still find reasons to condemn gays irrespective of the fact that gays work, pay taxes, vote, hold public office, provide professional services, own businesses, provide professional services, worship, raise their families and serve their communities in the same manner as heterosexuals. With respect to the workplace, there is no evidence that homosexuals are any less qualified, reliable, or productive employees than heterosexuals. This is especially evident in the teaching context where researchers found that male undergraduates who evaluated homosexuals concluded that gay teachers were not less qualified than straight teachers and these gay teachers were likely to succeed in the classroom. There are reservations as to whether the decisions to remove gay teachers from teaching positions can be supported on grounds that their presence disrupts the school environment.

To supplement the reasoning so far, we can learn from the experience of our closest neighbor as it has struggled with the same question, using a very similar framework of analysis. Canada has, in many regards, the same kind of individualistic cultural tradition that fuels so much of American jurisprudence. In addition, it has an analogous history of disparate treatment of those with a preference for same-sex partners.

III. THE CANADIAN TREATMENT OF SAME SEX COUPLES AND STRICT SCRUTINY

While the laws of other countries are not in any way binding on the interpretation of the United States Constitution, examining what thoughtful judges in other countries have done can offer perspectives to help our justices in their interpretations. The more similar the questions being considered and the more similar the laws in question, the more useful the examination. Studying what has happened in other jurisdictions can also help judges foresee some of the consequences a particular interpretation might have in our country. Again, the more similar the laws at issue and the nation to whose jurisprudence we look, the more useful is the examination of legal evolution of a particular legal principle. Examining what other countries do also helps us to see where the values being protected in our nation are in conflict or are consistent with the global moral climate.

The expansion of equal protection for homosexuals reflects a changing moral climate worldwide. One striking example is the growing number of nations providing equal protection for homosexuals with respect to protecting their right to marry a partner of the sex of their choice.

As justices in this nation consider the standard of scrutiny we apply to homosexuals under the Equal Protection Clause, it may be instructive for them to consider how the Canadians approach the equal protection of homosexuals under their Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which serves the same function as our Constitution in protecting individual rights. Examining how Canadians have extended equal protection to homosexuals may 279 As Justice Breyer explained, if something has been written “by a man or a woman who has a job like mine in another country, and who is interpreting a document somewhat like mine and who in fact has a problem in front of the Court somewhat like mine, why can’t I read it, see what they’ve done? I might learn something.” Justice Breyer on the Role of International Law, Justice Watch, <http://afijusticewatch.blogspot.com/2010/04/justice-breyer-on-role-of-international.html> April 1, 2010.

be extremely valuable because Canada and the United States share cultural, social, economic and political traditions. Indeed, according to Card and Freeman, "few countries offer a more natural pairing for evaluating policies and institutions or for uncovering the reasons for differences in outcomes than the United States and Canada."282

Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides that "every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, color, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability." The purpose of this provision is:

"[T]o prevent the violation of essential human dignity and freedom through the imposition of disadvantage, stereotyping, or political or social prejudice, and to promote a society in which all persons enjoy equal recognition at law as human beings or as members of Canadian society, equally capable and equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration."283 One could see this purpose as being similar to the purpose of the Equal Protection Clause of the U.S. Constitution.

Only when the law in question conflicts with this purpose will it be found to be in violation of the Charter. When analyzing whether a law conflicts with the charter, a three step test is used to determine the existence of a violation.284 The steps are whether a discriminatory distinction is formed, whether the claimant is subject to differential treatment as a product of that distinction, and whether the differential treatment discriminates, by imposing a burden upon or withholding a benefit from the claimant in a way that makes the claimant be viewed as less capable or worthy of recognition as a human being or Canadian citizen.\footnote{Id.}

In the case of \textit{Halpern v. Canada}, the claimants include seven same sex couples who sought to become married. Applications were filed with the Toronto Clerk’s office, which while not denying the applications, applied to the courts for direction and held the applications in abeyance. While these applications were in abeyance, the Metropolitan Community Church of Toronto performed ceremonies solemnizing the marriages of a number of same sex couples. Applications for these marriages were filed with the Office of the Registrar General, who denied the applications, stating that federal law prohibited same sex marriages. After this denial, the Metropolitan Community Church filed an action in the Divisional court, which was consolidated with the applications of the parties with filings in abeyance. The court eventually ruled that a denial of marriage to same sex couples constituted a violation of the \textit{Charter of Rights and Freedoms}, which resulted in an expansion of the definition of marriage to include same sex couples.

The first step in determining a law’s compliance with the charter is to determine either that the law draws a formal distinction between the claimant and other persons based on one or more personal characteristics, or that the law fails to take into account the already disadvantaged position of the claimant within Canadian Society that has resulted in substantially differential treatment on the basis of one or more personal characteristics.\footnote{Halpern O.R. at 17}

When determining whether a law is in compliance with this first step is to determine whether or not a distinction is made by the law in question. It is not necessary that the law create the discriminatory effect that is the source of the claimants harm but rather simply that the law has somehow made a potentially discriminatory distinction between the group in which the claimant belongs and the remainder of Canadian society.\footnote{Vriend v. Alberta, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493}

A formal distinction was found to have been in limiting the definition of marriage as being between a man and a woman.\footnote{Halpern O.R.2d at 18-19.} As a consequence of the Canadian government giving legal recognition to marriage and a series of rights and obligations surrounding that institution, denial of access to those rights and obligations constitutes a formal distinction between same-sex and opposite-sex couples.\footnote{Halpern O.R.2d at 19. The court then argues by analogy that denial of marriage on a religious or racial ground would definitely consist of a discriminatory distinction, which suggests that the Canadian courts are putting discriminatory distinction based on sexual orientation on the same level as discriminatory distinction against groups that in the United States would have the protection strict judicial scrutiny.} The court concludes that the common law definition of marriage has created a distinction that satisfies the first condition of a 15(1) Charter inquiry.

The second step in a 15(1) Charter inquiry is to determine whether or not the claimant experienced differential treatment based on an enumerated or analogous ground\footnote{An enumerated ground is any that is explicitly listed within the charter as a protected group, while analogous groups are any of those who are protected, but not specifically listed in the charted. Race, national or ethnic origin, color, religion, sex, and age or mental or physical disability are the current enumerated grounds in the Charter} that would be protected under the Charter. Case law has clearly enumerated that sexual orientation does in fact qualify as an analogous ground.\footnote{Egan v. Canada, (1995), (1995) 2 S.C.R. 513} The court in Egan referred to sexual orientation as a "deeply personal characteristic that is either unchangeable or changeable only at unacceptable personal costs". Because the laws discriminating against same sex couples are treating a class of persons differently based on an analogous ground, the second step in the inquiry has been satisfied.

The third step in performing an inquiry into whether a particular piece of law violates the charter of rights and freedoms is to determine whether discrimination has indeed occurred. When making this determination, the court looks to the substantive equality, not simply formal equality. "When we are looking to see if discrimination exists, we are seeking to preserve the human dignity of those who could be affected by the law." When making the decision as to whether or not the discrimination would violate the human dignity of a class or persons, the Canadian court looks to whether or not a reasonable person with the particular group's traits and history would find the differentiation in the law demeaning to their dignity.

In Law v. Canada, court outlined four different factors for a claimant to reference in coming to a determination as to whether or not the human dignity of the claimant has been violation. These factors are: (1) the preexistent disadvantages or vulnerabilities of the claimant class, (2) the connection between the grounds and the actual needs and circumstances of the claimant, (3) whether the law in question benefits an even worse off class of persons that the class of the claimant, and (4) the nature of the effected interest."

In regards to the first factor, Canadian courts give this factor the most weight, but do not go so far as to claim that it is determinative of discrimination having occurred. Canadian courts give this factor significant weight, as a law that discriminates against an already disadvantaged group has serious potential to expand the disparate effect that the previous discrimination has inflicted.296 In regards specifically to the homosexual community, Canadian courts have determined that evidence of such historical discrimination and disadvantage is both widely recognized and documented.297 This evidence of discrimination is not only prevalent, but demonstrates that the discrimination is present throughout the professional, public, and in private affairs, having potentially negative effects on all aspects of a person's life who is a member of the homosexual community.298 Due to this widespread documentation of historical discrimination, the first factor laid out in Law, is weighed heavily towards homosexuals being a class of persons in need of legal protections.

The second factor, the connection between the discriminatory grounds and the needs of the claimant, addresses whether or not the law in question operates to benefit the class in question. A law that accommodates the needs and capacities of the class in question is less likely to have a demeaning effect on that particular class of persons.299 It is difficult to assert that the denial of the right to marry to the homosexual community is somehow to the benefit of the homosexual community. When arguing in favor of a law that denied marriage to homosexual couples in Halpern, the Associated Gospel Churches of Canada (AGC) argued that law existed to serve the needs of heterosexual couples. It was argued that heterosexual couples were benefited by the fact that limiting marriage to only heterosexual couples would "facilitate, shelter and nurture the unique union of a man and woman who, together, have the possibility to bear children from their relationship and shelter them within it"300 The court was quick to dismiss this claim however, stating that just because a law may benefit one social group, we look to whether or not the group discriminated against is the one whose needs are addressed when analyzing the second factor of the test laid out in Law. Because the claimant class receives no benefit from marriage prohibiting legislation, Canadian courts have found that the second factor of the discrimination analysis indicates that discrimination against the homosexual community exists.

The third factor of the analysis is whether or not the legislation benefits a class or classes of persons who are in some way worse off than the claimant’s class. In Halpern, the respondent asserted that there is a negative impact on heterosexual couples by expanding the definition of marriage to include homosexual couples. This argument was quickly dismissed by the court however, based on the aforementioned discrimination that homosexual persons have historically been subject to, and that no discrimination to the same extent has been experienced by heterosexual couples. Furthermore, the respondent failed to produce evidence of a particular disadvantage that was unique to heterosexual married couples that would put them at a disadvantage in comparison to homosexual couples. Overall, this factor did not undermine the findings of discrimination that were present throughout the rest of the analysis.

Finally, when making an analysis as to whether discrimination exists, the courts look at the nature of the alleged discrimination. The more severe the effect is, and the more localized the effect that occurs, the more likely that the discrimination will be of the sort in violation of the Charter. An inability to benefit from certain legislation and economic detriment demonstrate that discrimination exists. In determining whether discrimination exists, however, we do not simply look at potential economic damage, but we also look to impact on the individual from a personal and societal perspective. Factors such as whether the discrimination denies access to a fundamental social institution or whether the discrimination completely fails to recognize a particular group can be considered by the court in this analysis. In Halpern, it was found that denial of access to marriage to homosexual couples rose to this level of discrimination under the argument that it was in fact denial of access to a fundamental social institution.

Since Halpern, which was a provincial case, was decided, nine other provinces in Canada used the same mode of analysis to provide equal protection for homosexuals and struck down laws prohibiting same sex marriage across Canada. Ultimately, the Canadian government passed legislation recognizing that equal protection required equal treatment of same sex couple with respect to the right to marry.

IV. CONCLUSION

A careful examination of the treatment and characteristics laid out in this article demonstrates that legislations affecting the rights of homosexuals should be subject to strict scrutiny, the same level of scrutiny applicable to racial minorities. Parts II and III of the article demonstrated that laws that discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation should be subject to the standard of strict scrutiny, as homosexuals clearly meet the standards for being a suspect class. Like racial minorities, sexual orientation is an immutable characteristic, and homosexuals are a discrete and insular minority, have been subject to a history of discrimination, have been subjected to social stigmatization, and have been politically powerless. Just as race bears no relationship to a person's ability to contribute to society, one's sexual orientation likewise bears no such relationship. 313

Examining how our closest neighbor, Canada, provides equal protection for homosexuals further strengthens support for the case that we should apply strict scrutiny to legislation that discriminates against individuals based on their sexual orientation. And, as we observe the consequences of providing a heightened level of scrutiny for this group in Canada, and we see that their society has not suffered any adverse consequences as a result, we can be more confident that this heightened level of scrutiny would not lead to harmful consequences in our country.

The foregoing analysis clearly illustrates the analogous situation of racial minorities and homosexuals in terms of the form of vulnerability that courts seek to protect when they designate a group as a suspect classification. In light of this strong analogy, just as the laws affecting the fundamental rights of racial minorities are entitled to strict scrutiny, so should laws adversely affecting the fundamental rights of homosexuals.
