“If a problem can't be solved within the frame it was conceived, the solution lies in reframing the problem.”¹

This article centers on the Seventh Circuit decision, Hively v. Ivy Tech Comm. Coll., which became the first U.S. Circuit decision to declare that sexual orientation discrimination is a type of sex discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The introduction highlights the difficulty in defining sex discrimination and provides an overview of the various approaches taken to try and define it. Part II provides background information on how sex discrimination became a part of Title VII, the development of sex discrimination through the courts, the changes in the Supreme Court's understanding of sexual orientation, and the EEOC's decision to expand sex discrimination. Part III provides the facts surrounding Hively and an explanation of its various opinions. Part IV critiques the Seventh Circuit's arguments because, while the decision correctly determines that sexual orientation discrimination is a form of sex discrimination, it fails to provide a new framework in which to make this determination, making it difficult for other courts to apply the decision's rationale. Finally, Part V discusses the impact of Hively and posits that, while the decision adds to the increasing number of voices for sexual orientation protection under Title VII, it may ultimately hinder that goal through its limited change in methodology for determining what constitutes sex discrimination.

I. CONSTRUCTING SEX DISCRIMINATION: INTRODUCTION TO TITLE VII AND THE COURTS' APPROACHES TO SEX DISCRIMINATION

Imagine you are an airline stewardess in the 1960s and you just got engaged.² On what should be a joyful day, your employer tells you that you will no longer be able to work for the airline because their policy is that only unmarried women can work as a stewardess.³ At the time, you would not have been able to claim employment discrimination because the employment policy did not “technically” discriminate on the basis of sex as it did not divide men and women into two groups.⁴ When stewardesses brought their sex discrimination claims, the airlines argued that being unmarried was a legitimate job requirement because their passengers (mostly male) preferred unmarried stewardesses; moreover, married stewardesses would create administrative burdens due to their home life demands.⁵ When this social policy argument failed, in large part because of the rise of the women’s movement, the airlines posited a new theory: the policy

² See generally Cary Franklin, Inventing the “Traditional Concept” of Sex Discrimination, 125 HARV. L. REV. 1307, 1348–54 (2012) (explaining battle over whether airline policies that terminated employment when stewardesses married or reached their early thirties constituted actionable discrimination based on sex or benign discrimination based on age and marital status).

⁴ See supra note 2 (explaining basis of hypothetical); see also Franklin, supra note 2, at 1353 (citing to court decision which held that airline policies did not constitute discrimination because policy did not divide employees into two perfectly sex-differentiated groups).

⁵ See Franklin, supra note 2, at 1349 (stating that airlines argued that hiring only young, single women as stewardesses was a legitimate business requirement because of passenger preference, of fear that husbands would call office to ask about wives, and that women would be unable to balance home and job).

discriminated based on marital status, not sex, because the policy did not sort men and women according to sex.⁶ The courts began to utilize this argument as a possible test for determining sex discrimination.⁷ Yet courts quickly stripped the normative analysis in sex discrimination determinations, describing the test as an objective rule that does not require additional value judgments.⁸ In doing so, the courts ignored the complexity of sex discrimination and prevented individuals like the stewardesses from bringing successful sex discrimination claims.⁹

Under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, it is illegal for an employer to terminate employment or refuse to hire an individual based on the individual's sex.¹⁰ This statute provides a needed cause of action for many but gives rise to the question of “what is sex discrimination?”¹¹ The courts have changed their answer to this question several times but traditionally defined it as discrimination “against women because they are women and against men because they are men.”¹² Sex, the court added, meant biologically female or male.¹³ Until recently, the federal courts agreed with this “traditional” definition of sex discrimination and consistently excluded sexual orientation claims, arguing that sexual orientation and sex are two different characteristics.¹⁴

Regardless, the Supreme Court has gradually re-interpreted sex discrimination to include other less “traditional” understandings of sex discrimination.¹⁵ Most notably, in Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, the Supreme Court found that sex stereotyping¹⁶ was a form of sex discrimination because determining that a female employee should not be aggressive is a sex-conscious decision.¹⁷

The Court’s decision to include sex stereotyping as a form of sex discrimination opened the door to previously barred sexual orientation discrimination¹⁸ claims.¹⁹ Struggling to compartmentalize the two claims, some courts barred any claims with a sexual orientation component, while others attempted to parse out facts supporting a sex discrimination claim from those supporting a sexual orientation claim, and then only looking at the sex discrimination claim.²⁰ However, in doing so, the courts created a bizarre situation where gay persons²¹ who “looked gay”²² could bring successful sex stereotyping claims, while gay persons who were known to be gay but did not exhibit “gay characteristics”²³ could not.²⁴

Then in 2017, the Seventh Circuit broke away from its precedent and included sexual orientation discrimination as prohibited under Title VII.²⁵ In Hively v. Ivy Tech Cmty. Coll. of Ind., where an openly gay woman brought a sex discrimination case against her employer alleging sexual orientation discrimination, the Seventh Circuit held that sexual orientation

See Committee on Lesbian and Gay Concerns American Psychological Association, Avoiding Heterosexual Bias in Language, 46 AM. PSYCHOLOGIST 9, 973–74 (1991) (recommending the use of the terms “lesbian, gay, or gay persons” as opposed to “homosexual” because of its connection with negative stereotypes).

REV. 715, 717 (2014) (arguing that gay persons are protected when their sexuality is perceivable via the senses as something that can be literally seen or heard). In his article, Brian Soucek utilizes this term to highlight the difference between gay persons who are perceived by others to be gay from those who are known to be gay. Here, individuals who “look gay” are those who have a better chance of bringing a successful gender non-conformity claim.

discrimination is sex discrimination under Title VII because sexual orientation discrimination necessarily involves thinking about sex.²⁶ The majority determined that there are three perspectives that justify, including sexual orientation discrimination under sex discrimination.²⁷ Although Hively expanded sex discrimination to include sexual orientation discrimination and thereby fixed the arbitrary distinction between looking gay and being gay, the four opinions highlight the difficulty that courts still face when interpreting sex discrimination under Title VII.²⁸

This Note discusses the development of sex discrimination under Title VII and argues that while the Seventh Circuit correctly held that sexual orientation discrimination is a form of sex discrimination, the court did so using incorrect arguments; rather than adopting a dynamic approach to statutory interpretation that melds gender non-conformity cases with developments in our understanding of sex, gender, and sexual orientation, the court continued to view sex discrimination in the same anti-classification way²⁹ that was originally used to limit the scope of

Title VII did not provide protection for sexual orientation claims.³⁵ This occurred in large part because of the courts' adoption of an anti-classification approach, which transformed interpreting sex discrimination from a dynamic statutory interpretation³⁶ approach to a focus on formal logic.³⁷ The historic interpretation changed when the Supreme Court expanded sex discrimination to include, most notably, sexual harassment and sex stereotyping claims.³⁸ Regardless of sex discrimination's expanded definition, the circuit courts refused to expand it to sexual orientation discrimination, using various types of interpretive methods such as legislative intent, common meaning at the time of enactment, and logical reasoning to support their decisions.³⁹ Despite this, gay persons started to bring successful claims under sex stereotyping because employers viewed the employees' mannerisms as being contrary to societal norms about how a person of a particular sex should behave, i.e., a gay man as acting effeminately or a gay woman as acting manly.⁴⁰ In response, the EEOC determined that sexual orientation discrimination does fall under Title VII.⁴¹ In Hively, the Seventh Circuit used the EEOC's arguments to find that sexual orientation is protected under Title VII.⁴² While a circuit court splitting decision, Hively followed suit with a growing trend of district court cases and with the EEOC's opinion on the issue.⁴³

A. Looking Back: The Historical Debate on Interpreting Sex Discrimination

Under Title VII, employers cannot discriminate on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.⁴⁴ However, when Title VII was enacted, its focus was on race discrimination.⁴⁵ In fact, sex as a protected class was added to the bill days before it passed as an attempt to thwart its passing.⁴⁶ Thus, there was little Health Ctr., P.C.*, 217 F. Supp. 3d 834, 839 (W.D. to no discussion about what sex discrimination claims would entail.⁴⁷ Regardless, after Title VII's enactment, there was significant debate regarding what kind of claims fell under sex discrimination.⁴⁸ Legislators, women's groups, politicians, and the EEOC all weighed in on what claims sex discrimination covered.⁴⁹ At the heart of this debate was the effect these claims would have on traditional sex and family roles.⁵⁰ This debate influenced how the EEOC and the courts applied the Title VII sex provision, with the EEOC eventually expanding sex discrimination to protect pregnancy discrimination and protective labor legislation, and with the courts developing jurisprudence that focused on normative judgments and stereotypes rather than an anti-classification approach i.e., determining discrimination based on categories not policy.⁵¹

Despite the ongoing debate into sex stereotypes and social roles, the “traditional” concept of sex discrimination primarily took hold in the Supreme Court case Gen. Elec. Co. v. Gilbert, wherein the Court held that pregnancy discrimination was not discrimination under Title VII because it did not divide men and women into separate groups.⁵² Under this anti-classification approach, the way to determine if sex discrimination occurred is to test whether the practice separated employees into a male group or a female group, with no overlap.⁵³ If so, then there was sex discrimination.⁵⁴ After the Gilbert decision, there was little debate in the courts about how to interpret sex discrimination.⁵⁵ However, this “traditional” concept of sex discrimination does not reflect the decades of debate that occurred on what sex discrimination should cover.⁵⁶

C. Getting Closer: Supreme Court’s Understanding of Sexual Orientation in Constitutional Context

The Supreme Court has also decided sexual orientation issues in other legal contexts, and, in recent years, the Court has expanded gay people’s rights.⁶³ In Lawrence v. Texas, the Court found that a state statute, the Defense Against Marriage Act, criminalizing homosexual intimacy violated the Due Process Clause.⁶⁴ In addition, the Court held that the statute violated Due Process because its definition of spouse excluded same-sex partners.⁶⁵ Most notably, same-sex couples now have the right to marry.⁶⁶ According to the Supreme Court, the laws in these cases “overcompensated for being a woman” and criticizing her use of profanity which was viewed as more shocking coming from a lady).

⁶² Id. at 288. See also id. (“An employer who objects to aggressiveness in women but whose positions require this trait places women in an intolerable and impermissible catch 22: out of a job if they behave aggressively and out of a job if they do not.”).

⁶⁶ See Obergefell, 135 S.Ct. at 2604 (noting that “[t]hese considerations lead to the conclusion that the right to marry is a fundamental right inherent in

created inequality because they prevented same-sex couples from enjoying the same rights as heterosexual couples.⁶⁷

D. Looking Back: Is Sexual Orientation a Stereotype?: Circuit Courts' Confusion Between Stereotypes and Sexual Orientation

Other courts have struggled and continue to struggle with distinguishing between sexual orientation discrimination and sex stereotyping claims.⁶⁸ While courts recognize this difficulty, their attempts to draw a line in the sand have created more confusion as to what type of actions are discriminatory.⁶⁹ For many courts, the the liberty of the person, and under the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment couples of the same-sex may not be deprived of that right and that liberty.”).

⁶⁹ See Prowel v. Wise Bus. Forms, Inc., 579 F.3d 285, 291 (3rd Cir. 2009) (“The line between sexual orientation discrimination and discrimination based on sex can be difficult to draw.”). Courts have tried various ways to tease apart the two concepts. See Hively v. Ivy Tech. Cmty. Coll. of Ind., 830 F.3d 698, 705 (7th Cir. 2016) (noting that some courts disallow claims where sexual orientation and gender non-conformity are together, some bar all claims from gay/lesbian employees, and others try to separate two types of claims to focus only on gender non-conformity allegations), rev’d and remanded, 853 F.3d 339 (7th Cir. 2017); accord Soucek, supra note 22, at 716 (illustrating that courts have created legal landscape where plaintiffs distinguishing factor is how the claim itself is presented.⁷⁰ If a claim provides facts that highlight a person's perceivable gender non-conformity behavior,⁷¹ then it is a sex stereotyping case and the person's sexual orientation is not relevant to the legal argument.⁷² Courts have identified characteristics such as how one who "look gay" have claims under Title VII while those who are not perceived to be homosexual but are known to be so rarely have claims).

⁷² Compare Prowel, 579 F.3d at 292 ("Prowel was harassed because he did not conform to his employer's vision of how a man should look, speak, and act – rather than harassment based solely on his sexual orientation. To be sure, the District Court correctly noted that the record is replete with evidence of harassment motivated by Prowel's sexual orientation. Thus, it is possible that the harassment Prowel alleges was because of his sexual orientation, not his effeminacy. Nevertheless, this does not vitiate the possibility that Prowel was also harassed for his failure to conform to gender stereotypes."). In Prowel, the plaintiff described himself as having "a high voice and did not curse; was very well-groomed; wore what others would consider dressy clothes; was neat; filed his nails instead of ripping them off with a utility knife; crossed his legs and had a tendency to shake his foot 'the way a woman would sit'; walked and carried himself in an effeminate manner; drove a clean car; had a rainbow decal on the trunk of his car; talked about things like art, music, interior design, and decor; and pushed the buttons on the nail encoder with 'pizzazz.'" Id. at 287, with Nichols v. Azteca Rest. Enters., 256 F.3d 864, 874 (9th Cir. 2001) ("At its essence, the systematic abuse directed at Sanchez reflected a belief that Sanchez did not act as a man should act. Sanchez was attacked for walking and carrying his tray "like a woman" -- i.e., for having feminine mannerisms. Sanchez was derided for not having sexual intercourse with a waitress who was his friend. Sanchez's male co-workers and one of his supervisors repeatedly reminded Sanchez that he did not conform to their gender-based stereotypes, referring to him as "she" and "her." And, the most vulgar name-calling directed at Sanchez was cast in female terms. We conclude that this verbal abuse was closely linked to gender."), and Reed v. S. Bend Nights, Inc., 128 F. Supp. 3d 996, 998 (E.D. Mich. 2015) (illustrating that certain facts such as that plaintiff's employer thought "being gay was disgusting" and that she did not "feel comfortable with [plaintiff's] sexuality" support non-actionable talks, walks, and dresses as indicative of non-conforming behavior.⁷³ On the other hand, if a claim only states that discrimination occurred because of the individual's sexual orientation, then it is a sexual orientation case and not actionable.⁷⁴ Some courts even refuse to look at gender non-conformity cases when sexual orientation is a factor because they do not want to try and distinguish the two claims.⁷⁵ Despite some courts recognizing sexual orientation claim, while facts like “she acted too manly,” “dressed more like a male than a female,” and had a “little more mannish” demeanor support gender non-conformity claim).

⁷³ See supra note 23 for description of gay characteristics. See also supra note 72 for facts highlighting gay characteristics.

⁷⁵ See Vickers v. Fairfield Med. Ctr., 453 F.3d 757, 764 (6th Cir. 2006) (dismissing gender non-conformity claim because it recognized that this would open door to sexual orientation claims because “[i]n all likelihood, any discrimination based on sexual orientation would be actionable under a sex stereotyping theory if this claim is allowed to stand, as all homosexuals, by definition, fail to conform to traditional gender norms in their sexual practices.”); *cf. claims under gender non-conformity, all of the other circuits have held that sexual orientation claims do not fall under Title VII.⁷⁶ This difference between the circuit courts' Title VII approaches and the Supreme Court's approach to sexual orientation adds to the confusing legal landscape where "a person can be married on Saturday and then fired on Monday for just that act."⁷⁷

(holding that plaintiff cannot bring successful gender non-conformity claim because "Simonton does not offer direct comparative evidence about how the alleged harasser treated members of both sexes in [his] mixed-sex workplace, and does not allege a basis for inferring gender-based animus, we are unable to infer that the alleged conduct would not have been directed at a woman.") E. Seventh Circuit's Reasoning Before Hively

Before Hively, the Seventh Circuit held that Title VII did not provide a remedy for sexual orientation discrimination.⁷⁸ However, the Seventh Circuit did recognize the possibility for a gay person to bring a gender non-conformity claim.⁷⁹ Regardless, the court did not allow gay persons to “bootstrap” their sexual orientation discrimination claims into sex discrimination claims.⁸⁰ Thus, the court held to the “traditional” concept of sex discrimination.⁸¹

⁷⁹ See Spearman, 231 F.3d at 1085 (recognizing that because of Price Waterhouse, individuals can bring evidence of stereotyping and harassment but that this evidence must prove sex discrimination); cf. Doe v. City of Belleville, 119 F.3d 563 (7th Cir. 1997), (holding that a gay plaintiff had a Title VII claim because “a man who is harassed because his voice is soft, his physique is slight, his hair is long, or because in some other respect he exhibits his masculinity in a way that does not meet his coworker’s idea of how men are supposed to appear and behave, is harassed ‘because of’ his sex.”) cert. granted and vacated, 523 U.S. 1001 (1998).

⁸¹ See supra note 78 for Seventh Circuit cases holding to Ulane reasoning; see also Ulane v. Eastern Airlines, Inc., 742 F.2d 1081, 1087 (7th Cir. 1984) (asserting that sex means “biological male or biological female” and that any other definition would have to come from Congress). Thus, the court determined that Congress intended “sex” to be understood as the “traditional concept of sex.” Id. at 1085. For an argument that Hively itself still conforms to the “traditional” concept, see generally Brian Soucek, Hively’s Self-Induced Blindness, 127 YALE L.J.F. 115 (2017) (arguing that all of Hively opinions focused on form, remaining blind to sex discrimination substance).

F. The EEOC's Response to Courts' Conflicting Views

A month after Obergefell v. Hodges, where the Supreme Court held that the right to marry is a fundamental right, and, thus, same-sex couples could not be deprived of that right, the EEOC decided Baldwin v. Foxx, where a federal employee argued that his employer discriminated against him because he is gay.⁸² The EEOC recognized the contradictory outcomes in the courts and decided that the distinction between sexual orientation discrimination and sex discrimination does not exist.⁸³ The EEOC determined that there are at least three ways that sexual orientation discrimination falls under sex discrimination: the comparative method, associational discrimination, and sex stereotypes.⁸⁴

Under the comparative method, an employer discriminates when the treatment of the employee would not have occurred but for the employee's sex.⁸⁵ Under associational discrimination,⁸⁶ an

July 16, 2015) (alleging that the complainant was not selected for position because he is gay); see also Obergefell, 135 S.Ct. at 2604–05 (holding that same-sex couples may exercise the right to marry). See generally Rebecca Hanner White, The EEOC, The Courts, and Employment Discrimination Policy: Recognizing the Agency's Leading Role in Statutory Interpretation, 1995 UTAH L. REV. 51 (1995) (illustrating EEOC's struggle with interpretive authority because Title VII did not provide the EEOC with explicit interpretive authority).

⁸⁴ See Baldwin at *27 (summarizing that an individual can bring sexual orientation claim under three approaches).

⁸⁵ See id. at *13 (asserting that when acting based on an individual's sexual orientation, the employer necessarily takes into account an individual's sex

employer discriminates when the treatment is based on the sex of the person with whom the employee associates romantically.⁸⁷ Under sex stereotyping, an employer discriminates when the treatment is based on gender assumptions, with sexual orientation being one of those assumptions.⁸⁸ Thus, the EEOC held that sexual orientation discrimination is necessarily sex discrimination

In 2000, Kimberly Hively started teaching as a part-time, adjunct professor at Ivy Tech Community College in South Bend, Indiana.⁹⁰ Between 2009 and 2014, she applied to at least six full-time positions at the college, but failed to receive any of them.⁹¹ In July 2014, the college did not renew her part-time contract.⁹² On December 13, 2013, Hively filed a pro se charge with the EEOC, arguing that Ivy Tech refused to hire her for the full-time positions or to renew her contract because of her status as an openly lesbian woman.⁹³

After exhausting the procedural requirements available to her through the EEOC, she filed a complaint in the District Court for the Northern District of Indiana.⁹⁴ At the district court level,

⁹⁰ See Hively v. Ivy Tech Cmty. Coll. of Ind., 853 F.3d 339, 341 (7th Cir. 2017) (stating Hively’s occupation and time at Ivy Tech Community College).

⁹¹ See id. (describing Hively’s attempts to procure full-time position).

⁹² See id. (stating that “in July 2014, her part-time contract was not renewed.”).

Ivy Tech filed a 12(b)(6) motion, arguing that sexual orientation is not a protected class under Title VII.⁹⁵ The court granted the motion and dismissed the case with prejudice.⁹⁶ Hively appealed, and, although the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, the court provided an in-depth analysis of circuit precedent and the EEOC's opinion in Baldwin.⁹⁷ After Hively filed a brief requesting a rehearing en banc, a majority of judges in regular active service voted to rehear the case en banc because of this issue's importance and to bring the law into conformity with the Supreme Court's guidance.⁹⁸

Ind., 830 F.3d 698, 699 (7th Cir. 2016) (stating that the complaint alleged that "although she had the necessary qualifications for full-time employment and had never received a negative evaluation, the college refused to even to interview her for any of the six full-time positions for which she applied between 2009 and 2014 . . ."), rev'd and remanded, 853 F.3d 339 (7th Cir. 2017).

The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, sitting en banc, reversed the district court's decision and remanded it for further proceedings, holding that discrimination based on sexual orientation is discrimination based on sex as stated in Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.⁹⁹ The four opinions in Hively each focused on determining a particular framework for statutory interpretation and then utilized that framework to determine what sex discrimination means.¹⁰⁰ Interestingly, each opinion utilizes a different interpretative approach that leads to a different response to what sex discrimination means.¹⁰¹ The majority focused on the EEOC's arguments and the Supreme Court's approach to sexual orientation in the legal landscape.¹⁰² Judge Posner, in his concurrence, posited a somewhat radical interpretive approach, wherein the court has the power to update old statutes so as to render them applicable to today's legal issues.¹⁰³ Judge Flaum provides a logically clear and simple approach: one cannot think about sexual orientation without taking the individual's sex into account.¹⁰⁴ Finally, the dissent focused on precedent and the idea that sex and sexual orientation are distinct categories.¹⁰⁵

¹⁰⁰ For discussion of each opinions' interpretative method and its application, see infra notes 106–181.

A. Following in the EEOC's Footsteps: Majority Finds Sexual Orientation in Sex Discrimination

The majority found that sexual orientation is a type of sex discrimination.¹⁰⁶ It viewed itself as having the authority and responsibility of bringing the Seventh Circuit in line with the Supreme Court's guidance on sexual orientation.¹⁰⁷ The majority opinion, written by Chief Judge Wood, began its analysis by noting that the court was not amending the statute but was rather only interpreting what it means to discriminate because of a person's sex.¹⁰⁸ For the majority, statutory interpretation begins with deciding whether the statute is plain on its face; if so, there is no need to look at secondary sources.¹⁰⁹ If not, one can look to the broader context of the statute, particularly the context at the time

¹⁰⁵ For further discussion of Judge Sykes's dissenting opinion, see infra notes 167–181 and accompanying text.

¹⁰⁶ See Hively, 853 F.3d at 351 (asserting the “common-sense reality that it is actually impossible to discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation without discriminating on the basis of sex, persuade us that the time has come to overrule our previous cases that have endeavored to find and observe that line.”).

¹⁰⁷ See id. at 343 (noting that “[i]n light of the importance of the issue, and recognizing the power of the full court to overrule earlier decisions and to bring our law into conformity with the Supreme Court's guidance, a majority of the judges in regular active service voted to rehear this case en banc.”).

¹⁰⁸ See id. (asserting that the court was not amending Title VII, but was only interpreting the statute and the meaning of word “sex”).

of enactment.¹¹⁰ However, for the majority, the context is only uncontroversial when its meaning is consistent with the conventional wisdom at the time about the law's reach.¹¹¹ The majority determined that interpretation becomes much more difficult when the statutory language includes multiple interpretations and unintended consequences.¹¹² Thus, according to the majority, while legislative history can highlight that Congress has rejected certain interpretations, it is notoriously unreliable.¹¹³

Instead of focusing on legislative intent and the statute's meaning at the time of enactment, the majority relied on the logical reasoning in Oncale v. Sundowner Offshore Servs., Inc., where the Court argued that statutes cover not only what Congress intended but also "reasonably comparable evils."¹¹⁴ Thus, the Hively majority followed this interpretative approach, reasoning that "the fact that enacting Congress may not have anticipated a particular application of the law cannot stand in the way of provisions of the law that are not on the books."¹¹⁵ In fact, the Even worse is the temptation to try to divine the significance of unsuccessful legislative efforts to change the law."); see also id. (highlighting that Congress could have decided to not include sexual orientation for various other reasons).

Sundowner Offshore Servs.*, 523 U.S. 75 (1998); see Hively, 853 F.3d at 344 (explaining that "[o]ur interpretive task is guided instead by the Supreme Court's approach in the closely related case of Oncale . . ."); see also id. (quoting Oncale, which states that "statutory prohibitions often go beyond the principal evil to cover reasonably comparably evils, and it is ultimately the provisions of our laws rather than the principle concerns of our legislators by which we are governed."). For further discussion of Oncale, see supra note 58 and accompanying text.

majority noted the Supreme Court had already expanded Title VII to cover discriminatory situations such as sexual harassment, actuarial assumptions about a person's lifespan, and gender non-conformity.¹¹⁶

The majority also looked to Supreme Court decisions that deal more generally with sexual orientation discrimination in order to understand the current legal landscape of sexual orientation issues.¹¹⁷ The majority found that the Supreme Court, in recent years, has consistently protected individuals discriminated against because of their sexual orientation.¹¹⁸ From these cases, the majority opined that there is a growing trend towards protecting gay persons and recognized that, in doing so, society can provide greater equality.¹¹⁹

The majority then analyzed plaintiff Hively's two proposed approaches to including sexual orientation discrimination under sex discrimination: the comparative method and associational

See generally id. at 349–50 (detailing other sexual orientation Supreme Court cases in Part III of opinion).

Texas*, 539 U.S. 558, 585 (2003) (O’Connor, J., concurring) (holding that the Texas criminal statute violated the liberty of the Due Process Clause because it criminalized homosexual intimacy); with United States v. Windsor, 570 U.S. 744, 769–70 (2013) (finding that the portion of Defense of Marriage Act that excluded same-sex partners from the “spouse” definition violated the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses); and Obergefell v. Hodges, 135 S.Ct. 2584, 2604 (2015) (holding that the 14th Amendment protected the right to marry as a fundamental liberty right).

discrimination.¹²⁰ The majority agreed with these approaches and found them to be valid examples of how sexual orientation discrimination can fall under Title VII.¹²¹ In addition, the court evaluated the comparative method with the sex stereotyping reasoning in Price Waterhouse and determined that sexual orientation claims can also be brought as sex stereotyping claims.¹²²

i. The Comparative Method

Under the comparative method, the only variable that changes in the scenario is the person's sex to determine if this change creates a change in the employer's actions.¹²³ Thus, the majority asked whether the college would have treated Hively differently if she was a man, but everything else stayed the same, notably her partner's sex.¹²⁴ If so, then the employer was discriminating based on sex.¹²⁵ In Hively's case, the court compared Hively as a lesbian with Hively as a heterosexual man and determined that she would not have been fired if she were a ¹²⁰ See Hively, 853 F.3d at 345 (noting that "Hively offers two approaches in support of her contention that "sex discrimination" includes discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.").

¹²¹ See id. at 344 (arguing for two approaches); see also id. at 345 (concluding that, under the comparative method, the defendant is discriminating against Hively because she is a woman); see also id. at 349 (illustrating that the associational discrimination theory also works).

¹²² Id. at 346 (determining that there is no line between gender non-conformity claims and sexual orientation claims).

¹²³ See id. at 345 (stating that the comparative method is where the court "attempt[s] to isolate the significance of the plaintiff's sex to the employer's decision: has she described a situation in which, holding all other things constant and changing only her sex, she would have been treated the same way?").

¹²⁴ See id. (noting that the hypothetical would make Hively a male heterosexual).

ii. Gender Non-Conformity

While the majority started with the comparative method, it ended up moving from the comparative method to a more nuanced method that focused on gender non-conformity.¹²⁸ According to the majority, there is no difference between a gender non-conformity and a sexual orientation claim.¹²⁹ The court noted that attempting to draw a line between the two types of claims has created contradictory and somewhat absurd results in both the district and circuit courts.¹³⁰ A lesbian (and gay persons in general) represented the “ultimate case of failure to conform to the female stereotype.”¹³¹ In both the situation where a woman was discriminated against for being too assertive and one where she was discriminated against for being a lesbian, the employer’s behavior necessarily had to take the victim’s biological sex into account.¹³² The majority reasoned that being heterosexual is just ¹²⁶ See id. at 345–46 (using the comparative method to determine if sex discrimination occurred).

¹²⁷ Id. at 345 (emphasis omitted).

¹³¹ Id. at 346 (stating that “Hively represents the ultimate case of failure to conform to the female stereotype”).

one of the many sex stereotypes, i.e., where an employer assumes that the acceptable behavior of a woman is that she be attracted to men.¹³³ Even before Price Waterhouse, the Supreme Court and the Seventh Circuit had allowed claims where women were discriminated at work for resisting stereotypical roles.¹³⁴ Thus, the court concluded that sexual orientation is the ultimate failure to conform to sex stereotypes since the proper behavior is for Hively, as a woman, to be sexually attracted to men.¹³⁵

iii. Associational Discrimination

The majority found that the associational discrimination approach to sex discrimination also protected against sexual orientation discrimination.¹³⁶ Under an associational discrimination approach, the issue is whether the discrimination would occur if Hively's partner's sex was changed.¹³⁷ This the victim's biological sex . . . into account. Any discomfort, disapproval, or job decision based on the fact that the complainant – woman or man – dresses differently, speaks differently, or dates or marries a same-sex partner, is a reaction purely and simply based on sex.”)

Martin Marietta Corp.*, 400 U.S. 543, 544 (1971) (holding that an employer cannot refuse to hire women with pre-school age children who hires men with pre-school age children), with *Sprogis v. ¹³⁶ See id. at 349 (holding that associational discrimination applies to sex discrimination cases and applies in this case).

¹³⁷ See id. at 347 (stating that “[i]t is now accepted that a person who is discriminated against because of the protected characteristic of one with whom she associates is actually being disadvantaged because of her own traits.”); see also id. at 349 (noting that “if we were to change the sex of one partner in a lesbian relationship, the outcome would be different. This approach comes from Loving and its line of cases where interracial couples were discriminated against.¹³⁸ While in those cases the claim was constitutional in nature, the majority argued that associational discrimination is also applicable under Title VII.¹³⁹ The majority then asserted that, since one can bring a race associational discrimination claim, then one can bring a sex associational discrimination claim because Title VII does not distinguish between the different discriminatory categories; thus, an argument made in race discrimination cases can be applied in sex discrimination cases.¹⁴⁰ Therefore, the majority held that sexual orientation discrimination can be considered a sex associational discrimination claim because “[i]f we were to change the sex of one partner in a lesbian relationship, the outcome would be different” which “reveals that the discrimination rests on distinctions drawn according to sex.”¹⁴¹

that the statutes remain relevant.¹⁴² Judge Posner argued that there are three ways to interpret statutes.¹⁴³ The last of these options is “judicial interpretive updating,” which he defined as, when the judiciary gives new meaning to a statute so that the statute has modern significance.¹⁴⁴

For Judge Posner, judicial interpretive updating only comes into play when a lengthy amount of time has passed since the statute’s enactment.¹⁴⁵ Judge Posner highlighted various other situations where “[s]tatutes and constitutional provisions frequently are interpreted on the basis of present need and present understanding rather than the original meaning.”¹⁴⁶ Judge Posner drew on the interpretative method in Missouri v. Holland, where Justice Holmes stated that “[w]e must consider what this country has become in deciding what that amendment has reserved.”¹⁴⁷

¹⁴² See id. at 355 (Posner, J., concurring) (emphasizing that the failure to adopt judicial updating would render Title VII anachronistic).

¹⁴³ See id. at 352 (Posner, J., concurring) (indicating that there are three approaches to statutory interpretation: the original meaning of the statute as understood by legislators, unexpressed intent, and the new meaning that applies to today’s situations). The first is the meaning intended by the legislators in connection with how the word is interpreted in everyday language. See id. (describing this approach as the most conventional and easy to determine). The second is interpretation by unexpressed intent where, for example, an ordinance states “no vehicles in the park” but it is understood that this does not apply to an ambulance. See id. (quoting William Blackstone, COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND 59–60 (1765) where Blackstone argued that “where words bear either none, or a very absurd signification, if literally understood, we must a little deviate from the received sense of them.”).

¹⁴⁴ See Hively, 853 F.3d at 352 (Posner, J., concurring) (alleging that Title VII “invites an interpretation that will update it to the present, a present that differs markedly from the era in which the Act was enacted.”).

¹⁴⁵ See id. at 353 (Posner, J., concurring) (emphasizing that this approach “presupposes a lengthy interval between enactment and (re)interpretation.”).

¹⁴⁶ Id. at 352 (Posner, J., concurring).

¹⁴⁷ See Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416, 433–34 (1920) (arguing that “[t]he case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and note merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago We must consider what this country has become in deciding what the amendment has reserved.”).

In Judge Posner's opinion, society's understanding of sex has changed dramatically.¹⁴⁸ As he stated, "today 'sex' has a broader meaning than the genitalia you're born with."¹⁴⁹ He then discussed how society's understanding of sexual orientation has changed, noting that, today, we understand that homosexuality¹⁵⁰ is "biological and innate, not a choice."¹⁵¹ Thus, being discriminated against for being a lesbian and being discriminated against for being a woman are analogous situations because there is no choice.¹⁵² For Judge Posner, there was no difference between the two situations because "homosexuality is nothing worse than failing to fulfill stereotypical gender roles."¹⁵³ Judge Posner admitted that this is a loose interpretation of "sex" but views this as justifiable because of the social policy to protect gay persons.¹⁵⁴ Thus, today's use of the word "sex" connotes both gender and sexual orientation.¹⁵⁵ According to Judge Posner, this can be viewed as the natural progression of ideas from sexual harassment to gender non-conformity to sexual orientation.¹⁵⁶ He was, however, reluctant to rely on the majority's use of Oncale and Loving, arguing that Oncale was still too limiting to allow sexual orientation discrimination, and Loving was inapposite because it concerned race and constitutional issues.¹⁵⁷ He concluded by highlighting that the judiciary frequently performs judicial interpretative updating so as to lessen the burden on the legislative branch to update statutes, and that it is the judiciary's role to utilize the social changes, since Title VII's enactment, in order to update the statute to modern times.¹⁵⁸

C. "SEX"ual Orientation: Judge Flaum's Concurrence
Argues Sexual Orientation Necessarily Involves Thinking About Person's Sex

Judge Flaum agreed with the majority's discussion of the comparative method, gender non-conformity, and associational discrimination.¹⁵⁹ However, he approached interpreting "sex" in a different manner.¹⁶⁰ He argued that "discrimination against an employee on the basis of their homosexuality is necessarily, in part, discrimination based on their sex" because homosexuality is the sexual attraction to persons of the same sex.¹⁶¹ Thus, one has ¹⁵⁷ See id. at 355–56 (Posner, J., concurring) (commenting that Oncale does not really help to expand the interpretive framework and Loving is a constitutional case on race).

¹⁵⁸ See id. at 357 (Posner, J., concurring) (asserting that the courts can update statutes so that the entire burden is not placed on Congress, and recognizing that judges understand the meaning of "sex" differently today because they live in a different time with a different culture).

¹⁵⁹ See id. (Flaum, J., concurring) (joining Parts I and II of the majority opinion).

¹⁶⁰ See generally id. at 358 (Flaum, J., concurring) (arguing that sex is fundamental to thinking about sexual orientation).

¹⁶¹ See id. (Flaum, J., concurring) (citing to various dictionary definitions of "homosexual" including Homosexual, MERRIAM-WEBSTER DICTIONARY ONLINE, <http://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/homosexual>; Homosexual, BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY (10th ed. 2014); and Homosexual, OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY (5th ed. 1964)). Homosexual is also defined as "of, relating to, or characterized by sexual desire for a person of the same to take into account an individual's sex in order to understand the individual's sexual orientation.¹⁶² Judge Flaum separated the discriminatory action into discrimination because of "(A) the employee's sex, and (B) their sexual attraction to individuals of the same sex."¹⁶³

According to Judge Flaum, since sex is evidentially a factor, the issue is whether Title VII requires the discrimination to occur solely because of sex.¹⁶⁴ The statute itself states that the enumerated trait only has to be a "motivating factor for an employment practice, even though other factors also motivated the practice."¹⁶⁵ Therefore, all that Hively must show to bring a Title VII claim is that the discrimination occurred because she is a woman who is sexually attracted to women.¹⁶⁶

Hopkins*, 490 U.S. 228, 241-42 (1989) (determining that 'because of' does not mean 'solely because of,' and, thus, there can be mixture of legitimate and illegitimate reasons for employment practice).

D. I Know Sex When I See It: Judge Sykes's Categorical Approach to Sex and Sexual Orientation

Like the majority, the dissent viewed the issue as one of statutory interpretation.¹⁶⁷ However, Judge Sykes believed the appropriate interpretive mode was to ask how a “reasonable person would have understood it when it was adopted.”¹⁶⁸ Therefore, the judiciary could not instill new meaning into the statute or update it to current conditions.¹⁶⁹ In addition, precluding sexual orientation from sex discrimination has been broadly accepted in the federal courts for many years.¹⁷⁰ Moreover, Congress has refused to include sexual orientation in Title VII, while adding it into other statutes.¹⁷¹ While there is debate in the public sphere, Judge Sykes believed that this debate has no place in statutory interpretation, which is an objective inquiry.¹⁷²

Using the comparative method, the dissent argued that the correct comparator is a gay male not a heterosexual one.¹⁷³ Under the majority's comparator, both sex and sexual orientation change, not just the sex variable; thus, in Hively's scenario, she not only becomes a man but also a heterosexual.¹⁷⁴ For Judge Sykes, sexual orientation and sex are two distinct categories that are unrelated to each other.¹⁷⁵

¹⁶⁷ See id. at 360 (Sykes, J., dissenting) (noting the “question before the en banc court is one of statutory interpretation.”).

Under the associational discrimination approach, the dissent argued that the miscegenation laws' purpose was to support white supremacy.¹⁷⁶ Since sexual orientation discrimination does not aim to maintain the superiority of one sex, the discrimination is not inherently sexist.¹⁷⁷ Thus, the Loving line of cases does not support merging sex and sexual orientation.¹⁷⁸

For the gender non-conformity approach, Judge Sykes asserted that Price Waterhouse did not create a separate theory to prove sex discrimination.¹⁷⁹ Rather, sex stereotyping can be evidence of sex discrimination, but there must still be proof that the employer relied on the employee's sex.¹⁸⁰ For the dissent, sexual orientation is not a sex-specific stereotype, and, thus, is unrelated to sex stereotyping.¹⁸¹

IV. OURS IS NOT TO REASON WHY: CRITIQUING HIVELY'S ANTI-CLASSIFICATION APPROACH AS PROMOTING RATHER THAN PREVENTING SEX DISCRIMINATION

Instead of encouraging the dynamic interpretation that occurred before Gilbert, Hively clung to the “traditional” concept, preventing the much-needed discussion of how to interpret sex discrimination in today’s social context from occurring.¹⁸² Under the anti-classification approach, the courts lost the dynamic approach based on social policy and gender stereotypes.¹⁸³ Moreover, they forgot how important the struggle to understand sex discrimination was to promoting changes in the normative roles of men and women.¹⁸⁴

¹⁸³ See id. at 1316 (asserting that, in Gilbert, “[t]alk of deference to the legislature and fidelity to tradition replaced discussion of the need to preserve the traditional family and women’s role within it.”); see also Soucek, supra note 81, at 116 (arguing that Hively decision resulted in “a gender-blind approach to equality closer to that of the conservative anti-classificationists on the Supreme Court than to the Justices who have thus far voted for LGBT rights.”).

By forgetting that history, the Hively opinion attempted to fit sexual orientation into the anti-classification form.¹⁸⁵ In doing so, it created a logically inconsistent reasoning wherein the court produced the outcome it wanted, i.e., sexual orientation discrimination under sex discrimination, but used the formalist framework.¹⁸⁶ Thus, Hively is not as groundbreaking as originally thought because all of the opinions utilized the same anti-classification framework that historically prevented sex discrimination claims that failed the comparator test from being brought, including sexual orientation discrimination claims.¹⁸⁷

¹⁸⁶ See Soucek, supra note 81, at 118 (showing that the majority’s comparative method fails to satisfy formal logic because it is unclear who the comparator should be and a heterosexual male comparator does not separate groups by sex). See generally id. at 115 (depicting how Hively opinions used the anti-classification approach, and yet failed to meet its logical requirements). See also Soucek, supra note 81, at 118–19 (noting that the gender non-conformity argument also fails the formal logic approach because both men and women violate heterosexual norms). A. Using the Gilbert Hermeneutic Approach: Comparative and Associational Discrimination Methods

In attempting to conform to the anti-classification approach, the Seventh Circuit tried to produce a result that promotes our society's changing views on sex, gender, and sexual orientation, while also trying to base that result in formal logic.¹⁸⁸ Couching the decision within the traditionally accepted framework of interpretation allowed the court to retain judicial legitimacy through the use of formal logic that identifies clear and definable categories, while avoiding a result based on complex sociological judgments.¹⁸⁹ The court's attempt to force a new result out of an old framework creates logical fallacies, as seen with the comparator and associational discrimination method.¹⁹⁰

The comparative method is the straight application of the "traditional" concept of sex discrimination, i.e., the anti-classification approach.¹⁹¹ This method attempts to separate individuals into mutually exclusive male/female groups.¹⁹² The protecting perceivable gay persons strengthens the conception that gay persons are "different").

¹⁸⁸ See Soucek, supra note 81, at 116 (concluding that, while Hively's result is a success for LGBT rights, its reasoning failed to note important changes in scholarship and advocacy that led to court's decision); see also infra notes 191–206 and accompanying text for discussion of Hively's use of anti-classification approach.

¹⁸⁹ Goldberg, supra note 37, at 740.

¹⁹⁰ See infra notes 191–206 and accompanying text for argument that Hively approaches create logically inconsistent results.

¹⁹² See supra notes 123–127 and accompanying text for a discussion of majority's comparative method. Compare Hively v. Ivy Tech Cmty. Coll. of Ind., 853 F.3d 339, 345 (7th Cir. 2017) (depicting the comparative method as holding all other variables equal except sex), with Franklin, supra majority believed that the correct comparator to a lesbian was a heterosexual male.¹⁹³ In doing so, Ivy Tech's sexual orientation discrimination does separate Hively into the female group, and, thus, sex discrimination occurred.¹⁹⁴

However, in the end, Judge Sykes is the only judge whose reasoning accurately corresponds to the conclusion.¹⁹⁵ The dissent argued that the correct comparator to a lesbian is a gay male because only the person's sex can change.¹⁹⁶ For Judge Sykes, the formal logic approach dictates that there is only sex discrimination if the discriminatory practice separates employees along biological sex lines.¹⁹⁷ Since sexual orientation is a sex-neutral trait, men and women are not separated into two separate groups, and, therefore, sex discrimination has not occurred.¹⁹⁸ The dissent's comparator falls more squarely within how courts have used the anti-classification approach, especially since it reinforces traditional concepts of sex.¹⁹⁹

note 2, at 1311 (noting that plaintiffs needed to produce opposite comparators, i.e., "individuals who are similarly situated to themselves in all salient respects aside from biological sex" in order to bring a successful sex discrimination claim).

¹⁹³ See supra note 126 and accompanying text (stating that the correct comparator is a heterosexual male).

¹⁹⁴ See supra note 127 and accompanying text (asserting that the discriminatory action did separate on the basis of sex).

Under the associational discrimination theory, the majority made a very similar argument to the comparative method because it still separated the partners into mutually exclusive sex-specific groups.²⁰⁴ Consequently, the logic is the same as under the comparator method but with the added dimension that the partner, not the employee, is a member of the protected class.²⁰⁵ So, just as with the comparative method, the comparator could either be a gay or heterosexual man, which still leaves the problem of who is the correct comparator.²⁰⁶

B. Taking the Plunge: Sex Stereotyping/Gender Non-Conformity Approach as Potential New Framework

To truly protect against sexual orientation discrimination, the court needed to discuss the development in societal conceptions of sexual orientation to a point where scholars now recognize the inherent connections between sexual orientation discrimination and sex discrimination.²⁰⁷ The majority almost took the leap to view sex discrimination from a social logic perspective as opposed to a formal logic approach but failed to take the ultimate steps.²⁰⁸ Following the dynamic statutory interpretation methodology, the majority recognized the need to look at the textual and historical aspects of the Title VII but found those perspectives did not provide a clear answer to defining sex discrimination.²⁰⁹ The final step the court should have taken is to move towards an evolutive perspective wherein the court analyzes the statute in light of “its present context, especially the ways in which the societal and legal environment of the statute has materially changed over time.”²¹⁰ While the court almost took this final step in discussing gender non-conformity, the court still included the comparator and associational discrimination approaches as possible ways to include sexual orientation discrimination.²¹¹ Moreover, the majority’s discussion of gender non-conformity was conclusory and decidedly lacking in analysis to back up the conclusions.²¹²

The majority asserted that being a lesbian is the “ultimate case of failure to conform to the female stereotype,” and decided to erase the line between gender non-conformity and sexual orientation claims.²¹³ However, the court framed the female stereotype as “be straight,” which is a sex-neutral trait.²¹⁴ Thus, on its face, both gay men and lesbians can violate the gender norm of “be straight,” indicating that the trait would fail the comparator approach.²¹⁵ Instead of changing the framework to a dynamic approach, the majority chose to manipulate the anti-classification approach so that it worked with the majority's desire to include sexual orientation as sex discrimination.²¹⁶

Judge Posner exhibited a willingness to change how courts approached sex discrimination but failed to provide sex discrimination with the necessary foundation in social logic.²¹⁷ He analogized Title VII with the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, which has been interpreted so as to conform with the relevant economic theories.²¹⁸ He used this analogy to promote updating Title VII but did not provide any guidance on what the new framework would be.²¹⁹ Instead of discussing possible frameworks grounded in gender and queer theory, he concluded that society now understands that gay persons are “normal in the ways that count.”²²⁰ While his judicial interpretive updating could have brought social and normative arguments into interpreting sex discrimination, his reasoning, like that of the majority, concluded

With judicial interpretive updating, Judge Posner needed to take the final step and provide his method with substance.²²² By engaging with social science theories on sex, gender, and sexual orientation, the court could take Price Waterhouse to its next natural progression: viewing sexual orientation discrimination as a form of sex stereotyping.²²³ As one commentator on Price Waterhouse noted, the Court easily saw the connection between sex discrimination and the statements calling the female partner “too macho.”²²⁴ What the Court failed to realize was why that link was easy to make.²²⁵ It was easy to make because the justices

While Hively represents a shift in the sex discrimination debate, the conflicting opinions from both the judicial and executive branch create confusion for employers and employees about discrimination in the work place and uncertainty for the courts about how to identify sex discrimination.²³³ Hively provided an answer to the issue of sexual orientation discrimination but did not provide an adequate framework in which to analyze future cases, creating future difficulty for the courts in how to apply the holding in other sexual orientation cases.²³⁴ Moreover, sticking to the anti-classification framework

VI. WHERE ARE WE NOW: STEPS TOWARDS UNDERSTANDING SEX DISCRIMINATION

Sex discrimination started off as a forum in which to debate concepts of sex, gender, and stereotypes, but the Supreme Court quickly cut off that debate, opting for a clear-cut "objective" approach, effectively silencing any development in what sex discrimination covered.²⁵⁰ Regardless, the Supreme Court slowly added additional types of claims to sex discrimination.²⁵¹ In adding gender non-conformity as a potential avenue for sex discrimination, the Court opened the door to sexual orientation discrimination claims.²⁵² However, courts were quick to shut that door because these claims were in contention with how courts have traditionally approached sex discrimination.²⁵³ The Seventh Circuit was the first circuit court to decide that sexual orientation discrimination was a form of sex discrimination, but the court still held onto the formalist approach that prevented developments in courts' understanding of what sex discrimination means.²⁵⁴ Rather, the court should have relied on the gender non-conformity method and coupled it with developments in social science and in our nation's understanding of how sex and sexual orientation are connected.²⁵⁵ In doing so, the court would have been able to provide a much more persuasive reasoning for their decision.²⁵⁶ A reasoning that would supply other courts, including the Supreme Court, with the necessary arguments to hold that sexual orientation discrimination is, in fact, a form of sex discrimination.²⁵⁷

²⁵³ See supra note 75 and accompanying text for discussion of courts refusing to listen to gender non-conformity cases if they involved a sexual orientation component.

²⁵⁵ See supra notes 207–232 and accompanying text for argument that social science and the gender non-conformity method create a method that aligns with sexual orientation discrimination as a form of sex discrimination.

²⁵⁶ See supra notes 222–232 and accompanying text for argument that court's analysis would have been more persuasive if it utilized different framework.
