Our Collaborative Mission

This issue of DePaul Magazine explores some of the innovative collaborations taking place at the university. We see faculty and students working together across several disciplines in a new refugee and forced migration studies program, the first of its kind in the United States. A dynamic new program of research grants is forging faculty partnerships among fields as diverse as health sciences and communication, physics and philosophy.

The College of Education is reaching out to businesses, schools and community organizations to provide them with teaching skills to more effectively educate their staffs. Students involved in social entrepreneurship are benefiting from a partnership with a technology incubator to learn coding and to better understand how to integrate technology into their business models.

These exchanges represent the heart of DePaul’s mission, linking varied voices, viewpoints and skill sets in service to education and society.
