Legislation following the Civil War provided the basis for the federal courts to assume the role as prime guarantors of individual liberty as against infringement by the states.¹ Not until the twentieth century did the federal courts really begin to assume the role;² and in the process of carving out the form of federalism that was ultimately to emerge, through increasing litigation brought under the Civil Rights Acts,³ a significant amount of judicial and academic effort has been spent in an attempt to give proper scope to those Acts.⁴ Since Justice Stone's separate opinion in Hague v. CIO in 1939,⁵ dealing with the problem of the scope of the Acts, both controversy and confusion have resulted from the attempt to reconcile the federal jurisdictional provisions of 28 U.S.C. §1331 and §1343 on the basis of distinguishing between personal liberties and property rights in suits claiming jurisdiction under §1343(3).⁶ That distinction as a basis for denying a federal forum for the protection of personal liberty from infringement by persons acting under color of state law has now been repudiated by the Supreme Court.

Recently suit was brought under 28 U.S.C. §1343(3) and 42 U.S.C. §1983⁷ seeking a permanent injunction and declaratory relief, alleging that

7. 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (1964) provides: "Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected any citizen of the United States or any other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities..."
the Connecticut attachment and garnishment statutes were unconstitutional in light of Sniadach v. Family Finance Corp., 395 U.S. 337 (1969). Plaintiffs, representing other Connecticut residents similarly situated, were low income wage earners whose checking and credit union accounts were garnished without prior notice to the alleged debtors and without giving the debtors an opportunity to be heard in their own defense.

Ms. Lynch, one of the plaintiffs, was employed, and on an income of $69.00 per week supported herself and a son, while providing partial support to another son. She deposited funds in an employee credit union, from which she made periodic withdrawals to purchase family needs. When Ms. Lynch’s account was garnished to satisfy a note held by defendant Household Finance Corporation, she was unable to pay her rent and was threatened with eviction.

Ms. Toro, a second plaintiff whose garnishment was subsequently released, was supporting herself and a son on $85.00 per week, derived from her employment and public assistance. She regularly deposited her weekly earnings in a checking account, which was garnished under the Connecticut procedure to satisfy an alleged indebtedness to a former landlord. As a result of the garnishment some of Ms. Toro’s outstanding checks were not honored, subjecting her reputation and credit to severe damage, especially because two of the checks were written to creditors holding security interests in her personal property. This sequence was able to occur despite the fact that Ms. Toro had valid defenses against the former landlord.

Plaintiffs were dismissed by a three-judge district court on the basis of lack of jurisdiction under §1343(3). Following the Second Circuit’s reaffirmation of the personal-property rights distinction in Eisen v. Eastman, the district court held that access to funds in checking and savings accounts is virtually indistinguishable from mere ownership of money, hence a property right. As a property right, jurisdiction would have to be based on §1331, requiring satisfaction of the minimum amount in controversy requirement. The parties were of limited means and, as a result of the personal-property rights distinction, were denied a federal forum in which to vindicate important federal rights.

In an opinion rendered without Mr. Justices Powell and Rehnquist, the Supreme Court reversed the district court dismissal and expressly rejected the distinction between personal liberties and proprietary rights as a guide to federal court jurisdiction under §1343(3)." Lynch v. Household Finance Corp., 405 U.S. 538 (1972).

The decision in Lynch is significant for at least three reasons. First, it lays to rest the controversy and confusion surrounding the personal-property rights distinction in §1343 jurisdiction. Second, it accentuates the trend whereby federal courts are increasingly looked to as the most appropriate forum for vindication of constitutionally protected individual rights, with the consequent recasting of the relation of federal and state courts in a system of national federalism. Finally, it draws attention to the near impossibility of attempting to treat property as anything other than a personal right.

It is the purpose of this case note to briefly review the legislative and court history of the personal-property rights distinction, noting the application of the distinction by the courts up to Lynch and the inconsistencies it had produced. Next, the unanimous opinion disposing of the personal-property rights distinction will be analyzed, with particular emphasis on the underlying policy arguments which might have been more thoroughly commented upon by the Court. Lynch provides particular credence to the American Law Institute proposal recommending elimination of the amount in controversy requirement under §1331, and special consideration will be given to this aspect of the decision's impact. Lastly, Lynch will be considered as it takes its place in the evolution of modern federalism, focusing on the scope of §1983 protections after Lynch.

11. In the alternative, defendants had argued that given jurisdiction under §1343(3), 28 U.S.C. §2283 (barring federal courts from granting injunctions to stay proceedings in state courts) would bar issuance of an injunction to stay the prejudgment garnishment. The Court rejected this application of §2283 on the basis that the Connecticut prejudgment garnishment, Conn. Gen. Stat. §52-239 (1968), is not a proceeding in a state court. Three Justices dissented from the majority on the §2283 question, arguing that plaintiffs should have been compelled to pursue their constitutional attack in the state courts. In support of their argument, the dissent raised contentions which relate to the same questions of federalism which underlay the continuing vitality and persistence of the personal-property rights distinction. However, the issues regarding federalism in the context of §2283 have been diffused by the Court's recent holding that §1983 is an express exception to §2283. Mitchum v. Foster, 407 U.S. 225 (1972).
HISTORY OF THE PERSONAL-PROPERTY RIGHTS DISTINCTION

The original Civil Rights Act of 1866,12 passed during the post Civil War reconstruction era to protect all citizens in the exercise of basic civil rights,13 is the origin of the present Civil Rights Act14 protecting individuals against deprivation of rights, privileges and immunities under color of state law. The constitutionality of the 1866 Act was established by passage of the fourteenth amendment,15 one of three constitutional amendments passed by Congress in response to the discriminatory "Black Codes" of the South.16 Modeled after §1 of the original 1866 Act, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1871,17 under the authority of §5 of the fourteenth amendment, to provide for the enforcement of that amendment.18 It is the Act of 1871 from which §§1983 and 1343(3) are directly derived.19 Today, the substantive provisions of the Act are contained in 42 U.S.C. §198320 and the jurisdictional counterpart in 28 U.S.C. §1343(3).21 These sections were first separated in 1875,22 and in the evolutionary process leading to the present §§1983 and 1343(3)23

12. Act of April 9, 1866, ch. 31, 14 Stat. 27 (1866).
19. §1983 was first enacted as §1 of the Civil Rights Act (also known as the Ku Klux Klan Act) of April 20, 1871, 17 Stat. 13. Of the five Civil Rights Acts passed between 1866 and 1875, which include Act of April 9, 1866, ch. 31, 14 Stat. 27 (1866); Act of May 31, 1870, ch. 114, 16 Stat. 140 (1870); Act of Feb. 28, 1871, ch. 99, 16 Stat. 433 (1871); Act of April 20, 1871, ch. 22, 17 Stat. 13 (1871); and Act of March 1, 1875, ch. 114, 18 Stat. 335 (1875), only §1 of 17 Stat. 13, presently §1983, remained [along with its jurisdictional counterpart §1343(3)] as a significant basis for subsequent litigation.

23. In 1871 Congress began codification of the then existing law under separate titles in the Revised Statutes. The jurisdictional provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1871 were placed in the Judicial Code of the Revised Statutes of 1875, granting distinct jurisdiction for circuit and district courts. These separate jurisdictional grants were merged when Congress abolished the circuit court original jurisdiction, some changes were made in the precise phraseology of the two statutes.\(^\text{24}\) This has caused some commentators to speculate as to newly imposed limitations on the scope of §§1983 and 1343(3) respectively.\(^\text{25}\) However, the Supreme Court has clearly enunciated that the purpose of the Act of 1871 was singular in providing redress for the deprivation of any rights secured by the fourteenth amendment,\(^\text{26}\) and it follows that the scope of §§1983 and 1343(3) should be co-extensive.\(^\text{27}\)

Congress expanded the national authority over matters previously reserved for state courts with passage of the general jurisdictional statute in the Judiciary Act of 1875,\(^\text{28}\) giving federal courts power to hear suits arising under article III, §2 of the Constitution.\(^\text{29}\) The provision is presently embodied in 28 U.S.C. §1331.\(^\text{30}\) The reasons for the passage of the Ju-

24. When the substantive provision was separated in the Revised Statutes of 1875, its language was altered to provide a remedy for deprivation of rights, privileges and immunities secured by federal laws as well as by the Constitution. Rev. Stat. §1979 (1875). However, the jurisdictional provision for circuit courts was limited to deprivations of rights, privileges and immunities secured by the Constitution or by any Act of Congress providing for equal rights. Rev. Stat. §629(16) (1875). The scope of the district court jurisdictional grant was worded exactly as the substantive provision. Rev. Stat. §563(12) (1875). When the jurisdictional provisions were merged in 1911, the equal rights limitation was retained. Act of March 3, 1911, ch. 231, 36 Stat. 1092 (1911). For a discussion of the language variances between §1343(3) and §1983 see Herzer, Federal Jurisdiction Over Statutorily Based Welfare Claims, 6 HARV. CIV. RIGHTS-CIV. LIB. L. REV. 1, 7-16 (1970).

28. Act of March 3, 1875, ch. 137, 18 Stat. 470 (1875). With exception of a short-lived attempt by Congress to give lower federal courts original jurisdiction under the authority of Art. III, §1, in the Act of Feb. 13, 1801, ch. 4, §11, 2 Stat. 92, repealed by Act of March 8, 1802, ch. 8, §1, 2 Stat. 132 (1801), the Act of 1875 was the first time Congress broadly exercised its constitutional power to give lower federal courts jurisdiction of all suits arising under the Constitution, laws and treaties of the United States. Tennessee v. Union and Planters' Bank, 152 U.S. 454 (1893).

30. 28 U.S.C. §1331 (1964) provides: "The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions wherein the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $10,000, exclusive of interest and costs, and arises under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. . . ."
diciary Act of 1875 are obscure due to a lack of Congressional debate, but it has been regarded as simply another step in strengthening the federal government against the states during the post Civil War era. Though not required by the Constitution, ever since the Judiciary Act of 1789 a minimum amount in controversy has been required in some types of cases to invoke federal jurisdiction, including those which are brought under §1331.

Early court interpretation of the fourteenth amendment was restrictive. The Civil Rights Acts passed to enforce the amendment were thus infrequently used through the early twentieth century, when most of the Court's attention was directed to the development of rising economic nationalism.

The late 1930's was an era in which various special interest groups were frequently seeking to achieve social change by engaging in public expression of their ideas. Often restricted by municipal authority as threats to public tranquility, these groups sought to redress the deprivation of their civil rights under the fourteenth amendment enforcement acts, notably the predecessors of §§1983 and 1343(3). Thus it was that the CIO, seeking to disseminate information regarding the new national labor legislation, invoked the aid of federal courts in Hague v. CIO.

In Hague, the Supreme Court found jurisdiction over the suit alleging that city ordinances prohibiting the right to hold public meetings and distribute leaflets constituted deprivation of the rights of free speech and assembly, though the Court did not express unanimity as to the basis of their affirmance of the lower court. Justice Stone filed a separate opinion wherein he found it necessary to protect §1343(3) from being swallowed up by the general federal question jurisdictional provisions of §1331, which would have had the effect of making the amount in controversy requirement applicable to civil rights cases. Finding that the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment guarantees to all persons, regardless of citizenship, basic personal liberties including freedom of speech and assembly, and that plaintiffs were thus authorized by the Civil Rights Act of 1871 to sue in equity to restrain infringement of those rights, Justice Stone then confronted the jurisdictional question as to amount in controversy. Noting the parallel existence of the two jurisdictional provisions, §§1331 and 1343(3), and that the language of §1331 could be read to include §1343(3), Justice Stone apparently felt it necessary to distinguish the two statutes so as to protect federal jurisdiction over those suits brought under §1343(3) irrespective of the amount in controversy requirement. He asserted that "... at least... [those] suits in which the subject matter is one incapable of valuation..." (emphasis added) could be brought under §1343(3) without satisfying any minimum amount in controversy requirement. He restated this "harmonization" of the two statutes by saying that §1343(3) conferred jurisdiction when "... the right asserted is inherently incapable of pecuniary valuation," and "... whenever the right or immunity is one of personal liberty, not dependent for its existence on the infringement of property rights." Ergo the personal-property rights distinction.

46. Rather than treating the several phrases used by Justice Stone to describe his concept as merely emphasizing language, some commentators have speculated as to possible operative distinctions. See, e.g., Note, Section 1343 of Title 28—Is the Application of the "Civil Rights-Property Rights" Distinction to Deny Jurisdiction
As noted in Lynch, the Supreme Court has never as a majority explicitly adopted the personal-property rights distinction in determining the boundaries of §1343(3) jurisdiction. But the lower federal courts have not had such a fortunate history: some have adopted the distinction, others have rejected it, still others have ignored it altogether where it might have been raised as an issue, and finally, some courts have recognized the distinction but proceeded to grant jurisdiction where the right involved was difficult to classify as either property or personal liberty. The Supreme Court, most notably when dealing with welfare rights, has often not noticed the distinction where it might have been raised as an issue. Further, the problems created by its application have evoked a flood of commentary, generally critical of the distinction and its limitation upon the operation of §1343(3) and frequently calling for the pre-

The Second Circuit had been one of the most consistent adherents of the personal-property rights distinction, confirmed by Judge Friendly in Eisen v. Eastman. Recognizing the difficulties that an application of the personal-property rights distinction necessarily entails, Judge Friendly nevertheless felt compelled to follow Justice Stone in Hague by denying §1343(3) jurisdiction in a suit which challenged the constitutionality of a rent control law. Eisen was the case most prominently relied upon in the district court's denial of jurisdiction in Lynch, thus leading to the ultimate demise of the distinction.

THE SUPREME COURT DISPOSES OF THE PERSONAL-PROPERTY RIGHTS DISTINCTION

Lynch v. Household Finance Corp. was an opportunity for the Supreme Court to lay to rest the confusion some federal courts had brought upon themselves by over-interpretation of Justice Stone's analysis and to remove an outmoded impediment to vindication of federally guaranteed rights in the most appropriate forum. The well-documented his-

Judge Friendly recognized the personal-property rights distinction but did not apply it because he considered that a business license could be interpreted as involving either personal liberty or property rights.

tories of §§1331 and especially 1343(3), recent Supreme Court decisions dealing with vindication of rights containing mixed elements of personal liberty and proprietary interest, continued conflict of outcome in lower federal courts which dealt with the personal-property rights question, and increasing acceptance of the concept of property as a truly personal right, all provided persuasive argument for simply dispensing with Justice Stone's formulation as no longer necessary. Further, the jurisdictional question of a purported limit to §1343(3) certainly posed for the court important policy considerations in terms of its impact on the administration of federal courts, and more importantly on the role of federal courts in the American federal system as it evolved from the Reconstruction Era.

In concluding that there is no limit to §1343(3) jurisdiction in terms of a personal-property rights dichotomy, Justice Stewart speaking for the Court, relied on all of the above arguments and dealt briefly with the impact on federal court administration:

[This] court has never adopted the distinction between personal liberties and proprietary rights as a guide to the contours of §1343(3) jurisdiction. Today we expressly reject that distinction.

Acknowledging that there is no basis for such a distinction in the legislative histories of either §1331 or §1343(3) to apply to specific kinds of acts which deprive persons of their individual rights, the Court concluded that there is simply no conflict between the two jurisdictional provisions. The Court recognized the difficulty of applying this distinction, thus giving rise to the statement that "property does not have rights. People have rights." Finally, the Court notes that whatever concern there might have been, in careful reconciliation of §§1331 and 1343(3) to prevent denial of jurisdiction over an important case because of the amount in controversy requirement, surely does not now obtain in light of the erosion of the impact of §1331 by other specific jurisdictional statutes which do not contain an amount in controversy requirement.\(^7\)

The important underlying policy considerations which present fundamental reasons for the inception of the personal-property rights distinction in the first place, and which certainly were partially responsible for its continued vitality, were at least implicitly dealt with by \(\textit{Lynch}\). One of these, often disguising more basic concerns, is that expansive interpretation of federal jurisdictional statutes will impede the courts' ability to effectively administer the caseload, because such interpretation would invite a "flood of litigation." It is possible that elimination of the personal-property rights distinction as a limitation to §1343(3) jurisdiction may result in an increased caseload.\(^7\) But these cases alleging deprivation of constitutional rights by persons acting under color of state law, present important federal questions,\(^7\) which are better litigated in a federal forum.\(^7\) For a Supreme Court which has been especially concerned

\(^7\) Consider Judge Friendly's admonition in \(\textit{Negron v. Wallace}, 436 F.2d 1137, 1141 (2d Cir. 1971): \". . . \textit{[T]he framers of the Act of 1871 could hardly have intended it to become the standard method of constitutional attack upon state action. . . .} Suits under that statute thus should not be lightly brought. Apart from the burden they impose on federal judges and their abrasive effect on federal-state relations, counsel should never forget Mr. Justice Jackson's observation . . . that 'it must prejudice the occasional meritorious application to be buried in a flood of worthless ones.' . . . There is thus a responsibility, resting upon all counsel . . . not to swell the tidal wave of actions under the civil rights statute by bringing suits for declaratory or injunctive relief when no need for this exists.\" (citations omitted).

\(^7\) Lynch v. Household Finance Corp., 405 U.S. 538, 546 (1972). \textit{But see} Hingle \textit{v. Perez}, 312 F. Supp. 127, 129 (E.D. La. 1970), where the court argues that the federal courts should \textit{not} spend their time on cases involving small pecuniary value, even though federal questions are presented.

with protection of individual liberties, the Stone formulation necessarily had to be discarded as an unworkable argument on which to rely as a means of controlling the "flood of litigation." Thus it was that the distinction was discarded by the unanimous nod of the seven Justices sitting on the case, despite vigorous expressions of concern with increasing case-loads in the federal courts by some of the Justices in other cases.

But the more significant policy consideration which inevitably runs through Lynch is that of the Court's century long struggle with striking a balance between the need to protect federal rights in a federal court with the need to protect the respective roles of federal and state courts in a system of federalism undergoing significant alteration in recent decades.

The question then arises as to what the Court has said about this most fundamental question of federalism in relation to protection of individual liberties, through its decision in Lynch. Has the Court by having wholeheartedly repudiated the personal-property rights distinction, as seized upon by courts to limit the role of the federal judiciary in the protection of important personal liberties against state action, thereby given credence to the idea that the common law of civil liberties had truly been nationalized by the fourteenth amendment and that the federal courts are the only appropriate guardians of these rights? Clearly an affirmative answer to this question would be to overstate the impact of Lynch. But with an artificial barrier removed, analysis might be made of the kinds of rights which the courts will protect under §1983, and in defining the limits to the scope of §1983 protections the federal courts will necessarily give further delineation to the form of modern federalism.

The Civil Rights Act is narrower in scope than general federal question jurisdiction, §1343(3) jurisdiction being limited to state action or

77. The concept of an evolving federalism is pointedly addressed to by the ALI Study, supra note 74, at 6: "The objective of this study is that cases be divided between the state and federal courts in a manner grounded on rational principle. Access to federal courts should not be frozen into a pattern set in 1789 or 1875, whether or not the pattern was right to meet the needs of its time, if it does not make sense in light of conditions in the last half of the twentieth century." application of state law.\textsuperscript{80} Beyond this basic premise, it is instructive to consider instances where courts have not applied §1983 protections. Even where the alleged deprivation is due to state action, the courts are reluctant to infringe upon state taxing power,\textsuperscript{81} though denial of relief may ultimately result in restriction of an underlying constitutional right. Nor does it extend to protection of rights guaranteed by state law.\textsuperscript{82} The protections of §1983 have been narrowly circumscribed by some courts when dealing with allegations of infringement of employment status, unless racial overtones can be shown,\textsuperscript{83} and have not been extended by other courts to state laws prohibiting strikes by public employees.\textsuperscript{84} Other examples of denial of jurisdiction may be found, often resulting in the denial of a hearing to redress an important constitutional right.\textsuperscript{85}

However, a wide range of cases, some directly contradictory to those cited above, have been granted jurisdiction. Many cases involving welfare rights have been granted jurisdiction under §1983,\textsuperscript{86} as have challenges to state employment tenure laws,\textsuperscript{87} to denial of employee salary benefits at a state university where free speech was at issue,\textsuperscript{88} and to discriminatory discharge from public employment.\textsuperscript{89} In addition, §1983 protections include protection of free speech where infringed by obscenity statutes,\textsuperscript{90} sex discrimination,\textsuperscript{91} equitable relief against actions by judicial officers,\textsuperscript{92}

and voting rights.93

In the cases cited above, where jurisdiction was granted under § 1343(3), the courts frequently proceeded to touch on development of the basic doctrines making up the structure of the relation today between federal and state courts.94 These standards and tests, as applied to suits to redress constitutionally protected liberties under the mandates of the Supreme Court,95 without the troubling shibboleths such as the personal-property rights distinction, will necessarily result in a clearer picture of the structure of modern federal-state relations.

Since suits alleging infringement of basic personal liberties, including those associated with so-called property rights, are usually brought alternatively under §§1331 and 1343(3), and because Lynch has removed the threshold blockade to discussion of the real issues of federalism in cases under §1343(3) that might have been denied jurisdiction by the personal-property rights distinction, it would seem to follow that it is desirable to eliminate the amount in controversy requirement under §1331 as a last remaining impediment to the full treatment of constitutional rights of individual liberties in the context of the basic issues of federalism.

Based on the suggestion of Mr. Chief Justice Warren, the American Law Institute completed a study in 1969 of the federal judicial system reappraising the distribution of business between the federal and state courts, in the face of rapidly increasing litigation in the federal courts.96 It is submitted that the decision in Lynch, in having eliminated the personal-property rights distinction as a limit to §1343(3) jurisdiction, presents another indication of the expansive trend in the federal courts and thereby gives import to the proposal to eliminate the amount in controversy requirement under §1331.97

While cautioning against allowing litigation involving civil rights to dominate federal question thinking, the ALI Study discusses the most important arguments why suits involving vindication of federally protected rights should be litigated in a federal forum irrespective of the monetary value that the suit may represent. These include the special expertise of federal judges in dealing with constitutional questions, uniformity in the application of federal law, and possible hostility or conflict present in a state court which is called upon to test the constitutionality of one of the laws of that state. However these reasons are not taken to conclude that all federal question litigation should be in a federal forum.

Further, the ALI Study does note that there are some types of cases which still suffer from denial of federal jurisdiction because they are of the limited category still subject to the §1331 amount in controversy requirement, such as deprivation of constitutional rights by federal officers and deprivation of federal civil service preference rights for veterans. The amount in controversy requirement is the source of other jurisdictional difficulties to litigants. Problems are often encountered by multiple parties in dealing with aggregation of their claims to meet the amount in controversy. Courts have been tempted to find their way around the requirement where it is "... not so clearly baseless that the court was bound to disregard it..." or by accepting as not speculative allegations of damages for infringement of rights not easily susceptible to valuation, even in cases where no relief in damages is sought. Even Judge Friendly in Eisen v. Eastman noted that adherence to the Stone formulation in Hague would result in denial of a federal forum because of the amount in controversy requirement of §1331 and cited the ALI Study with approval, and in another case gave broad interpretation to the scope of 28 U.S.C. §1337, granting jurisdiction of any civil action arising under any act of Congress regulating commerce, so as to avoid the amount in controversy problem. Finally, at least one court has suggested that in cases where validity of the amount in controversy was doubtful and the action was triable by jury as of right, that the jury should determine the amount in controversy to protect plaintiff's right to jury trial. Elimination of the amount in controversy requirement certainly provides the simpler means of protecting individual rights and assuring litigation in the most appropriate forum.

The inherent difficulty in using an arbitrary figure as the minimum amount in controversy to establish jurisdiction is illustrated by the statistics of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts cited in the ALI Study which indicate that the majority of the federal question cases heard to judgment result in awards of less than $10,000 anyway.

Finally, the ALI Study reiterates the argument that elimination of the amount in controversy requirement would have little impact on the business of the federal courts, because of numerous specific jurisdictional statutes which are exceptions to §1331, including the exception provided by §1343(3). The ALI Study discusses the personal-property rights distinction as commendable so far as it dispenses with the amount in controversy requirement where the suit is to redress a right not capable of pecuniary valuation, but questions the desirability of the distinction where it bars cases involving real constitutional issues. By removing this significant category of cases where the amount in controversy requirement might have some effect on limiting litigation in the federal courts under federal question jurisdiction, the decision in Lynch establishes that the requirement is no longer consistent with current thinking regarding proper subject matter jurisdiction and that the ALI proposal should be adopted, with its focus on the proposition that litigants should at least have a choice of forum in which to vindicate federally protected rights.\textsuperscript{113}

The early post-Civil War enabling legislation, enacted to give life to the fourteenth amendment, has undergone a long process of growth as the Court gradually undertook to intervene on the behalf of an ever larger number of individual liberties when these were threatened by action under the color of state authority. The Supreme Court in \textit{Lynch} has properly discarded the much disputed personal-property rights distinction as a limitation to federal court intervention, thereby casting new light on the form of modern national federalism. In so doing, the amount in controversy requirement under federal question jurisdiction appears in conflict with court pronouncements encouraging a free choice of the federal forum in which to vindicate important constitutional rights without arbitrary limitations, and as controlled only by the more substantial issues of federalism such as are found in the abstention doctrines.
